TRANSLATOR'S INTRODUCTION

WHEN Anatole France went on his lecture tour to South America in 1909 the subject which he prepared was François Rabelais, and the substance of those lectures, with slight modifications, is contained in this volume. We know from the not altogether friendly confidences of M. Jean Jacques Brousseau that France's success as a lecturer was mediocre. The Bishop of Buenos Ayres denounced both Rabelais and Anatole France and made it impossible for the pious to attend the meetings. "At the last lecture," M. Brousseau writes, "there was not a soul in the boxes and not one woman in the house. In all, three hundred baldpates. It was funereal. The Master, smiling and short-sighted, and fingering sheaves of notes, explained Francis I's subtle policy to empty stalls and boxes peopled with shades, with a little pause for applause at the end of each paragraph. It might have been the Collège de France on a rainy winter day."

According to his secretary, France finally abandoned this heretical and unpopular subject, delivering a lecture on the Argentine which was received with that appreciation which only young nations achieve in the presence of complimentary strangers. One likes to believe that M. Brousseau is not relying upon his imagination for his facts when he says that a passage from Sur la Pierre [Blanche, "where Gallio foretells the future grandeur of the Christian sect, and the new nations which shall tear her hegemony from Rome," was adapted to the needs of the occasion and admirably fulfilled its purpose. The lectures now published have, at least, a more authentic character than the improvisations with which the Master attempted to obliterate the shame of his choice of subject.

That choice may have been determined in some measure by the fact that it was made at the time when France was writing his Jeanne d'Arc. M. Brousson declares that there were two bookcases on one of the landings of the Villa Saïd, one containing everything that had been written on "the heroic shepherdess," the other, "topped by a plaster bust of Rabelais, containing everything that he had been able to pick up in the shape of studies, engravings of the Father of Pantagruel. Pointing to the two contrasting bookcases, he used to say 'Here is the poison ! Here is the counter-poison !' " The poison was, of course, the fifteenth century, with its credulous piety, its miracle-mongering, its heresy-hunting. The counter-poison was the discovering of printing, the revival of humanism, the setting up of many books instead of One.

The antithesis represented by those two bookcases will be found throughout the entire course of these lectures. Anatole France sees in his illustrious predecessor the rebel and scholar who made possible a tradition of humanism and scepticism of which France was himself the last distinguished opponent. He has not written a popular life of the author, but a learned commentary on his times and his work. Even had the circumstances been different, if he had not had in mind a mixed audience, it is doubtful if France would have dwelt very much on the "Rabelaisian" side of Rabelais. He is, indeed, at pains to free him from the charge of drunkenness Although himself an often charming sensualist, there is little in him of the hearty, full-blooded vitality of Rabelais His kinship with him is of a subtler and purely intellectual order

As a Hellenist Rabelais attracted France, for was not Greek a heresy to the Church? He is tempted to see in the creator of Pantagruel a forerunner of Voltaire, the first embodiment of the Voltairean spirit in French literature Nowadays, when a generation of French writers has arisen to set up all the idols which Rabelais, Montaigne, Voltaire, Renan, and Anatole France threw down, when individualism is deprecated, and acquiescence in authority, both ecclesiastical and political, is preached by the new prophets of neo-Thomism, this posthumous work has a special interest It is the last utterance of a voice which was heard all through the author's life expounding the sane and urbane philosophy whose revival is traced in this study of Rabelais

Those who were in the habit of viewing Anatole France as a vulgar anti-clerical, those who could not reconcile his socialistic leanings with his personal fastidiousness and pessimistic detachment, will find in the antithesis upon which this study rests an answer to their queries As between the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, France could not but choose the latter The reason for that choice becomes clear as he contrasts the free spirit of Rabelais with the spirit of his time The fashionable medievalists of to-day in Paris did not wait, as so many did, for the death of Anatole France in order to decry him, even if they did leave it for the Surrealists to discover that he could not write French They

AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION

It is not without prolonged reflection, it is not without a careful weighing of every consideration, that I have chosen the theme on which I have come to address you, and, if I have decided to speak to you about Rabelais, it is not without reason I have decided to study with you, if such be your pleasure, the author of Pantagruel because I know him a little, because he is a very great writer, and moreover, among the great writers, one of the least known and the most difficult to know, because the history of his life and works has been of late years entirely reconstituted by critical research and I can reveal to you some curious new lights on this old subject, but finally and above all, because the work of this great man is good, because it disposes the mind to wisdom, to toleration, to gay charity, because the reason derives pleasure and strength from them, because we learn from them the precious art of laughing at our enemies without hatred or anger Those, I believe, are good reasons But perhaps also, unconsciously, because the very difficulties of the task have tempted me To place before you Rabelais, the great Rabelais, the real Rabelais, without wounding, without shocking, without alarming anyone, without offending for a moment the chastest ear, that seems a dangerous enterprise But I have a complete confidence that I shall be able to carry it through with success I am sure that I shall not utter a single word that might disturb the most delicate modesty But that is not all The life of Rabelais is bound up with those great movements of the Renaissance and the Reformation in which the modern spirit was shaped And that also helped to decide my choice The majesty of the theme will transmit a certain strength to my discourse I shall touch on those questions

AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION

with a freedom worthy of you I have too high a regard for you not to tell you all that I consider to be the truth For you are yourselves men of truth, among you I have—I know it, I feel it—set my foot on a soil of freedom where nothing hinders the soaring of human thought It would be an insult to you not to open to you my whole soul and my whole heart It was you who summoned me, and here I am before you without reserve or pretence But need I assure you that it would be, in my belief, treason to the most hallowed principles of hospitality if I were to deviate in the least degree from the respect due to conscience, to conviction, to faith, to the inner life of the soul ?

I also have my convictions, I also have my faith If it were to happen, by an impossible chance, that they were to be violently attacked on this hospitable soil, I should reply by a calm silence, in the assurance that calm is the proper attitude of reason, disdain the true mark of intellectual independence But why seek for clouds in a clear sky ? We are here in the serene domains of literature, to which you have invited me, where all is concord, peace, friendship, smiles

It seems to me that the best method of presenting to you the life and work of a great writer is to set forth the facts in chronological order I shall therefore tell you all that is known about Rabelais from birth to death, and we shall study his books at the dates of their appearance I know that I am hardly equal to an audience such as yours, but one must avoid all pretence, even that of modesty

THE LIFE OF RABELAIS

IN the garden of France, near a forest, at the foot of a rocky hill surmounted by the ancient castle of the Plantagenets and the Valois, on the right bank of the river Vienne, stands the finest city in the world, according to its most illustrious son, a famous city, at all events, as its coat of arms declares

Chinon,
Little town, great renown,
On old stone long has stood
There is the Vienne if you look down,
If you look up, there's the town

RABELAIS

for which reason a citizen of Chinon, whose acquaintance we are about to make, attributes its foundation to Cain, the first builder of cities. At the end of the fifteenth century, and at the beginning of the sixteenth, Chinon gaily displayed its crooked streets, its spires and towers in the moist sunlight of Touraine. At this time Antoine Rabelais, gentleman of La Devinière, Bachelor of Laws, carried on his profession as a lawyer and, being the oldest lawyer of the circuit, he was entrusted in 1527 with the highest jurisdiction in the district of Chinon, in the absence of the lieutenants general and particular. His father had died young, his mother, Andrée Pavin, was married for the second time to a certain Sieur Frapin, and presented him with six children, one of whom became Canon of Angers, lord of Saint Georges, and the author of some beautiful and joyful carols in the language of Poitou.

On the death of his mother, which occurred in the year 1505, Antoine Rabelais inherited the property, castle and mansion of Chavigny, together with all seignorial and manorial rights, and all taxes, rents, income and services, all rights of hunting, fishing and grazing reserved to the deceased.

In the town he owned a large house, known as the house of Innocent, the Pastry Cook, which became an inn, "At the Sign of the Lamprey," towards the end of the sixteenth century. There was a cellar connected with the house. In order to go from one to the other, contrary to the usual procedure when going to the cellar, it was necessary to climb up to that cellar by as many steps as there are days in the year, because it stood much higher than the house, on a level with the castle which overlooked the town. After having climbed up, one entered the cellar by going through an archway covered with paintings. For this reason the cellar was called the Painted Cellar.

Antoine Rabelais also owned, in the parish of Sully, a full league from Chinon, opposite to Roche-Clermout, the farm of La Devinière, after which he was called. The vineyard was planted with pintau. That is the name of a dark grape of small size, whose bunches are in the shape of a pine needle. To say that the grapes of La Devinière were exquisite is not enough. Let us rather listen to the remarks made at La Saulaie by a certain drinker, a son of that soil, as he sat on the green grass when Gargantua was born. "O! Lachryma Christi, it is from La Devinière! O! the fine white wine, upon my conscience it is a kinde of taffetas wine, hin, hin, it is of one care, well wrought, and of good wooll." "Of good wooll," our drinker, who knew the farce of Pathelin, talks like a merchant who is praising his cloth, and when he declared that the wine is of one ear, it is because the people of Chinon put the good wine in one-eared flagons, or in other words, flagons with a single handle. Certain connoisseurs declare that this little wine, although quite decent, was nevertheless too rustic and vulgar to be thus clothed in taffetas and velvet. Let us not listen to them. It is better to rely on the drinker at La Saulaie. It ill becomes a Rabelaisian to depreciate the vineyard of La Divinière.

The wife of Antoine Rabelais, who was a Dusoul, had already borne three children to her husband, Antoine, the elder son, Jamet, the younger, and Françoise, when, about 1495, she brought into the world her last-born, François, who was to rival in knowledge the most learned men of the century and to relate the most diverting and most profitable stories which have ever been told in this world. It is believed that François was not actually born at Chinon but at La Deviniere, whose memory was always so dear to him that I have just been afraid to criticise its vines, lest I should irritate his cheerful shade.

From his third to his fifth year he spent his time like the little children of the countryside. "That is, in drinking, eating and sleeping, and in sleeping, drinking and eating, and in eating, sleeping and drinking still he wallowed in the mire he blurred and sullied his nose he blotted and smutch't his face, he trode down his shoes in the heele at the flies he did oftentimes yawn, and ran very heartily after the butterflies, dabbled everywhere. His father's little dogs eat out of the dish with him. What I have quoted is the childhood of Gargantua. That of François Rabelais was very similar, I assure you.

Towards the age of nine or ten years, the child was sent, not far from La Deviniere, to the village of Seully, where there was an Abbey in which, forty years before, had lived a certain Guillaume Rabelais, who had kept up his relationship with the family of young François. Whether his parents sent him there to make a monk of him and wished to consecrate their last-born to the Lord, we do not know. We do not even know whether his mother did not die in giving birth to him, as Badebec expired on bringing Pantagruel into the world. But one cannot help recalling in this connection this remark of the little monk of Seully, in his old age, on the subject of mothers whose children are destined from infancy to the cloister "I am amazed that they carry them for nine months beneath their hearts, seeing that in their homes they cannot bear nor suffer them nine years, nor even seven, more often, and by simply adding an ell to their dress and cutting I know not how many hairs from the top of their head, by means of certain words they turn them into birds." By "birds" he means monks, and he gives the reason which, in most cases, prompts parents to give their children to the Church. The reason is that monks, having renounced the world, are disqualified from inheriting. "Therefore," he says, "when there are too many children, whether male or female, in some good family, insomuch that the house would come to nothing, if the paternal estate were shar'd among them all (as reason requires, nature directs, and God commands), parents rid themselves of their children by making them clerghawks." "Clerghawk," the word is peculiar to our author, but its meaning is obvious.

They say that François Rabelais met at Seully a young monk named Buinart, who astonished him by his simple good sense, his faithful heart and his powerful fist, and that later on he made him Friar John of the Trencherites, by improving much upon nature, it is true. But, if it is true that Friar Buinart was angry at the portrait, either he was too simple-minded to understand, or he judged it by hearsay and according to the reports of malicious people.

On leaving Seully, the scholar entered as a novice the monastery of La Baumette, founded by King René. There he met the young offspring of an old Touraine family, Geoffroy d'Estissac, who became Bishop of Maillezaïs at the age of twenty-three, and two of the brothers du Bellay, one of whom was a Bishop and the other a Captain. He made a very good impression upon all three of them and prejudiced them greatly in his favour.

Rabelais finished his novitiate with the Franciscans of Fontenay-le-Comte, went through all the stages of the priesthood, and took orders about 1520. Amidst all these monks, who, they say, made vows of ignorance rather than of piety, he devoted himself ardently to study and, if it is true, as it seems, that later on, when portraying the man of study, he portrayed himself, we cannot doubt that his youth was chaste and thoughtful, thoroughly exemplary. Indeed, it is a pleasure to recognise the young Friar François in this rich and fresh picture which adorns one of the chapters of the Third Book of Pantagruel.

“Contemplate a little, the form, fashion and carriage of a man Exceeding earnestly set, upon some learned meditation, and deeply plunged therein, and you shall see how all the arteries of his brain are stretched forth, and bent like the string of a cross-bow. Nay, in such a studiously musing person, you may espy such extravagant raptures, of one, as it were, out of himself, that all his natural faculties, for that time, will seem to be suspended, from each their proper charge and office, and his exterior senses to be at a stand. In a word, you cannot otherways choose than think, that he is by an extraordinary ecstasie quite transported out of what he was, or should be. Therefore, is it, that Pallas, the Goddess of Wisdom, Tutress, and Guardianess of such as are diligently studious and painfully industrious, is, and hath been still accounted a virgin The Muses upon the same consideration are esteemed perpetual maids and the Graces for the like reason, have been held to continue in a sempiternal pudicity

“ I remember to have read, that Cupid on a time being asked of his mother, Venus, why he did not assault, and set upon the Muses, his answer was, that he found them so fair, so sweet, so fine, so neat, so wise, so learned, so modest, so discreet, so courteous, so vertuous, and so continually busied and employed one in the speculation of the stars, another in the supputation of numbers, the third in the dimension of geometrical quantities, the fourth in the composition of heroick poems, the fifth in the joyful interludes of a comick strain, the sixth in the stately gravity of a tragick vein, that approaching near unto them, he unbended his bow, shut his quiver, and extinguished the torch, through meer shame and fear, that by mischance he might do them some hurt or prejudice Which done, he thereafter put off the fillet wherewith his eyes were bound, to look them in the face, and to hear their melody and poetick odes There took he the greatest pleasure in the world, that many times he was transported with their beauty and pretty behaviour and charmed asleep by their harmony, so far was he from assaulting them or interrupting their studies ”

At Fontenay-le-Comte Rabelais burned with an inextinguishable thirst for knowledge, the thirst which then consumed the greatest minds and the noblest souls The great breath which passed over the whole world at that time, the warm breathing of the springtime of the mind, had touched his forehead

Humanity was reborn in the genius of antiquity Italy had been the first to awaken to science and beauty In the country of Dante and Petrarch, the ancient wisdom had never completely died A strange fact, related by a capable annalist of the fifteenth century, Stefano Infessura, is a symbol, as it were, of this awakening

It was the 18th of April, 1485, there is a rumour in Rome that some workmen from Lombardy, while digging along the Appian Way, have found a Roman sarcophagus, with these words engraved upon the white marble JULIA DAUGHTER OF CLAUDIUS On raising the cover, they saw a virgin of fifteen or sixteen years, whose beauty, by reason of unknown ointments or some magic charm, shone with a dazzling freshness With her long, fair hair spread upon her white shoulders, she was smiling in her sleep A troupe of Romans, seized with enthusiasm, lifted the marble bed of Julia and carried it to the Capitol, where the people came in a long procession to admire the unspeakable beauty of the Roman virgin They stood in silence looking long at her, for her figure, the chroniclers say, was a thousand times more admirable than that of the women who lived in their day In the end the city was so deeply moved by this spectacle that Pope Innocent, fearing lest a pagan and impious cult might be born of the smiling body of Julia, caused it to be removed by night and secretly buried But the Roman people never lost the memory of ancient beauty which had passed before their eyes

Scholasticism died everything was reborn, everything was revived, everything smiled

Friar Rabelais, in his monastery at Fontenay, experienced that zeal for knowledge and understanding which fired the minds of the élite at the time. There, amongst all those monks who were afraid to study lest their heads should burst, were three or four who, like himself, were devoted to classical studies. One of them is known to us by the Greek surname Phinetos. Another was Pierre Lamy who, being far advanced in his Greek studies when Friar François, his junior, was beginning, had acquired the esteem of the most famous humanists by reason of his knowledge.

In those times, in every country, the disciples of learning knew each other, sought each other out, and formed what were almost secret societies. They visited each other and indulged in learned discourses between themselves, of whose freedom our academic discussions can give no idea. If they could not see each other, they corresponded. Then the correspondence of scholars was the equivalent of contributing to special reviews at the present time and of communications to the Institute. The number of learned letters exchanged by the humanists was prodigious. "I am overwhelmed with letters from Italy, France, England and Germany," said Henri Estienne. Erasmus tells us that he received twenty letters a day and wrote forty.

The Hellenist monks of Fontenay consorted with the best minds of the country. Jean Brisson, King's Advocate, and his relatives, who urged Friar François to throw his habit to the and entirely occupied in copying Bibles, printing grew, spread and became the universal dispenser of sacred and profane letters. Texts were multiplied by the press ; to speak in terms of Pantagruelism, it was an enormous wine-press from which flowed the wine of knowledge for all.

Paris, which had its first printing press under Louis XI, in a cellar of the Sorbonne, very soon had twenty or thirty The learned city of Lyons had fifty by the beginning of the sixteenth century At that time Germany had more than a thousand The book fair was a source of inexhaustible wealth to Frankfort The treasures of antiquity, which had once been locked up in the coffers of a few humanists, were released and circulated everywhere. Virgil was printed in 1470, Homer in 1488, Aristotle in 1498, Plato in 1512 Men of letters in every country exchanged their ideas and their discoveries amongst themselves In the city of Bâle, at the back of a printer's shop, a little old man, thin and feeble, Erasmus of Rotterdam, with tireless spirit led humanity in the direction of greater knowledge and consciousness

While the past was being revealed in its classic glory and beauty, the navigators, Vasco da Gama, Columbus and Magellan, showed the real shape of the earth, and the system of Copernicus, by bursting the narrow limits of the astrological heavens, at once revealed the immensity of the universe.

In France learning was restored ; colleges sprang up everywhere, protected by the bishops against the laziness and barbarism of the monks. Scholasticism, dry and sterile, was dying , its death, in the domain of the spirit, was the death of death

Friar Rabelais, in his monastery at Fontenay, experienced that zeal for knowledge and understanding which fired the minds of the élite at the time There, amongst all those monks who were afraid to study lest their heads should burst, were three or four who, like himself, were devoted to classical studies One of them is known to us by the Greek surname Phinetos Another was Pierre Lamy who, being far advanced in his Greek studies when Friar François, his junior, was beginning, had acquired the esteem of the most famous humanists by reason of his knowledge dogs, hoping that afterwards they would enjoy his conversation more freely, Artus Caillé, first lieutenant particular of Fontenay, André Tiraqueau, Caillé's son-in-law, a judge at Fontenay; Aymery Bouchard, president of the court of Saintes, all humanists and great admirers of antiquity, all people who found infinite beauties in the Pandectes and who, like Pantagruel, knowing by heart the fine texts of Roman law, could discuss them like philosophers. Did they not hope (and not without reason) to find once more in those ancient texts upright rules and just laws? With them Rabelais himself became a rather good lawyer and a great admirer of Papinian.

Pierre Lamy was in correspondence with the illustrious annotator of the Pandectes, Guillaume Budé, who knew Latin and Greek better than anybody in France, and who joined to his learned studies the important office of secretary to the King. This great man wrote to the monks of Fontenay learned letters in Latin and Greek, and in each letter he had a word for young Rabelais: "My salutation to your brother in religion and science. . . Farewell and a fourfold salutation in my name to the gentle and learned Rabelais by word of mouth, if he is with you, or in writing if he is away."

The gentle and learned Rabelais aspired to the honour of also receiving a letter from the great man. Pierre Lamy promised to get him one, but for a long time his efforts were in vain. Friar François, not receiving any, denounced his companion in pleasant terms to Guillaume Budé as having given himself more heavily laden with Roman law, was not exactly light humour

These giants of learning played with the Digest as Gargantua played with the large bell of Nôtre Dame

Judge Tiraqueau, who had married in 1512, at the age of 24, Marie Caillé, spinster, aged 11, was looking for the best means of instructing, educating and forming the mind of his young wife
To this end he consulted the ancients and, having compared a multitude of texts, he hastily composed a treatise De legibus con- nubialibus, upon which, it is supposed, he made the young Franciscan scholars of Fontenay work, and which was printed in 1513
The doctrine of Tiraqueau as to the rights and duties of married couples is in substance as follows :

Woman is inferior to man ; it is her duty to obey, his to command That is the will of nature.

Strength and reason are the man's part

One must choose a wife who is neither too beautiful nor too ugly, whose position in life is analogous to one's own, without, however, avoiding too carefully marriage with a daughter of the nobility. Marriage with widows and women of mature age should be avoided Men should marry at the age of thirty-six , women at eighteen. (We have just seen that Tiraqueau had married a girl of eleven when he was twenty-four ) It is well to make inquiry concerning the family, country and character of one's future wife

Betrothal Women should not adorn themselves for any man other than their present or future husband Each one should reveal his or her defects to his or her future partner, but the girl need not undress in the presence of her betrothed

The husband should not allow his wife to consider herself his equal. However, he must refrain from striking her or maltreating her in any manner whatsoever, for she has two kinds of revenge at her hand. The one is obvious, the other is poison.

The woman's domain is the garden, her tool the distaff. A husband may seek his wife's advice, but let him beware of telling her his secrets.

Let those who wish to be loved by their wives love them in return and be strictly faithful to them. Let married couples refrain from having recourse to incantations, philtres and other forms of magic whereby people think hearts may be won. Let it be by dint of mutual affection and other honourable means that they cause conjugal love to be born, endure and grow between them.

Undoubtedly the learned Tiraqueau does not treat women as they were commonly treated at that time all over Gaul, in stories and farces. His tone is not that of the author of Fifteen Joys of Marriage. He wishes to be just. And that is what is serious. To be completely just to women is to do them a complete injustice. Despite the praise which Rabelais gave him, in all matters Tiraqueau was lacking in gentleness and charm. He maintained that, as good women were rare, it is not necessary to make laws for them. He made them suffer for the wicked. In a word, although not an enemy of women, he was not their friend, because he was not a friend of the Graces. His book caused some stir. Avineri Bouchard, president of the court of Saintes, a great friend of the Hellesmist Franciscans of Fontenay and of Tiraqueau himself, undertook to refute the De legibus connubialibus in a Latin work which, by a refinement of elegance, had a Greek title, Τῆς γυναικείας φύσεως, On the Nature of Women, an apologia for the sex so harshly treated by the judge of Fontenay.

Rabelais was the friend of Aymery Bouchard, he was even more, it seems, the friend of André Tiraqueau. The latter consulted the young Franciscan in this lawyer's quarrel, although it was not a matter for the Church.

For Tiraqueau there was one obscure point in the affair. Aymery Bouchard said in his book that the women had engaged him as lawyer, entrusting him with their defence against the author of De legibus connubialibus. The judge of Fontenay could not understand how the women had thought of taking a defender in a trial which turned upon a book that they had not read, since it was written in Latin. How did they know that they had been attacked? the judge of Fontenay anxiously inquired. On this difficult point, Friar François gave an explanation with which Tiraqueau declared himself satisfied.

Aymery, said the young monk to him, who has a taste for women (mulierarius, says the text), may well have gone so far, at table or by the fireside, as to translate for them into French, after his own fashion, the passages in the book where the sex is not always spared. He wanted to blacken your character in order to recommend himself to their good graces.

It is evident that already young Friar François was observing and learning to know human nature. But, being too much of a scholar not to consult the ancients, he immediately invoked the authority of Lucian, who recommends the orator, in his ῥητόρων διδάσκαλος, to make himself agreeable to women if he wishes to succeed.

It is thus that François Rabelais, in the flower of his age, being involved in this learned quarrel, was called upon to consider the advantages and disadvantages of marriage, between the horns of which dilemma, we shall later see Panurge, his other self, suspended.

In 1520, Pierre Lamy went to Saintes, to President Aymery Bouchard's, the defender of women. During his sojourn in this town he wrote to Judge Tiraqueau, the adversary of women, a Latin letter which has been preserved, and which shows us that the mutual friendship of the two champions had not been lost in the quarrel. In it Rabelais is mentioned as a very young man, already full of learning, but who has only lately begun to try to write in Greek.

“I am torn,” said Pierre Lamy, “by contradictory emotions when I foresee that if, in the interests of Aymery, I have been obliged to remain for a long time far from those for whom I am consumed with regret, that is to say, you and our dear Rabelais, most learned of our Franciscan brothers, on the other hand, I shall have to tear myself away from the delights of Aymery in order to return to you, which, to my great joy, will be scarce delayed. But I find deep consolation in the thought that, while enjoying one of you, I enjoy the other, so alike unto one another are you in character and learning, and that this same Rabelais, so diligent in fulfilling the duties of friendship, will keep us frequent company by his letters, both Latin, the composition of which is most familiar to him, and Greek, at which he has for some time been striving . . . I shall wait to tell you more about this until we can at leisure resume our meetings beneath our laurel grove and our walks along the paths of our little garden."

It is not surprising that Rabelais, who was trying in 1520 to write familiar letters in Greek, was able, four years later, to compose verses in this language in imitation of Meleager. He celebrated the De legibus connubialibus in an epigram which, according to the custom of the time, Tiraqueau printed at the beginning of the book in the edition of 1524. The following is a literal translation :

"Seeing this book in the Elysian Fields, both men and women will say : ' If Plato had taught us the laws whereby the famous André taught his Gauls the conjugal union and the glory of marriage, would there be amongst men any more illustrious than Plato ? ' "

The work thus celebrated is an indigestible compilation, a collection of texts brought together without any artistic or critical sense. Tiraqueau greater than Plato ! . . . This vain and unmeasured praise was lost in its own immensity. The fault is less that of Rabelais than of the spirit of the times, in which there was no sense of proportion either in praise or invective.

After what we have seen, it cannot be said that the regulations at Fontenay were very severe or that the monks lived separated from the world. But the Chapter and most of the monks looked with an unfriendly eye on the three or four Hellenists of the community. They were afraid that knowledge, and especially knowledge of Greek, would destroy the soul. This fear was not peculiar to them, it existed in every convent. It was believed that Greek made heretics. At Fontenay a certain Arthus Coultant, amongst others, was very much opposed to the Hellenists, if we may judge by the resentment which he aroused in Rabelais, whose bête noire he was. A spy and a calumniator, he rendered every kind of disservice to the studious monks. That is what our author gives us to understand when he calls him, in his joyful indignation, an articulating friar, that is, one looking with curiosity, and a diaboliculating friar, that is, a calumniating one.

Finally the Chapter had a search made in the cells of Pierre Lamy and François Rabelais. Greek books were found, some writings from Germany and Italy, and the works of Erasmus. These books were confiscated. In addition a serious accusation was brought against the two scholars. They were reproached with devoting the profits which they drew from preaching the gospel to the upkeep of a large library, instead of consecrating them to the monastic revenues. That is a grievance of which we cannot judge, but whose seriousness we can feel.

Pierre Lamy and François Rabelais, deprived of books and paper, placed in solitary confinement, suffered great woes and feared worse, through the action of these wretched monks, whom ignorance and fear rendered credulous and cruel. Friar François, prudent and sage, feared the hobgoblins. That was what he called Friar Arthus and all the other diaboliculating friars. Pierre Lamy was not any more confident. At this stage the learned man remembered that the ancient Romans practised divination by reading a book at the place which they had marked with their nail before opening it, and that, as the works of Virgil were preferably used for this purpose, they called this manner of reading the future the Virgilian lotteries. He took a Virgil, slipped his finger into the closed book, opened it and read at the place so marked this verse :

Pierre Lamy and François Rabelais did not scorn the warnings of the oracle. Deceiving their gaolers, they escaped by prompt flight from the claws of the cruel hobgoblins and found a sure retreat in the country, for they had friends there. The position of a fugitive monk was none the less precarious and dangerous. From some unknown hiding place, sick with torment and uneasiness, they made powerful personages take action in their favour and found protectors even in the King's household.

The great Guillaume Budé, to whom they both wrote, replied to them with the eloquent and sincere indignation of a Hellenist who saw other Hellenists punished for having cultivated those beautiful studies which he himself cultivated so lovingly. His letter, with its pompous indignation, is in the turgid style proper to all scholars' letters of the period, of which Rabelais was soon to give us some beautiful examples. For he could be Ciceronian if necessary. Here, translated into English, is a sufficiently long passage from the letter from Guillaume Budé

“ O immortal God, Thou who presidest over their holy congregation and over our friendship, what news has reached me ? I learn that you and Rabelais, your Pylades, because of your zeal in the study of the Greek tongue, are harrassed and vexed in a thousand ways by your brothers, those sworn enemies of all literature and all refinement. O fatal madness ! O incredible error ! Thus the gross and stupid monks have been so carried away by their blindness as to pursue with their calumnies those whose learning, acquired in so short a time, should be an honour to the entire community. . . We had already learned and seen with our own eyes some marks of their insensate fury ; we knew that they attacked ourselves as the chief of those who had been seized, as they say, by the fury of Hellenism, and that they had sworn to annihilate the cult of Greek letters, recently restored, to the eternal honour of our epoch . . .

“ All friends of learning were ready, each in the measure of his power, to succour you in this extremity, you and the small number of brothers who share your aspirations towards universal knowledge . . . but I have learned that these tribulations ceased since your persecutors discovered that they were placing themselves in hostility to people of credit and to the King himself. Thus you have honourably emerged from this trial and will, I hope, resume your work with renewed ardour.”

Rabelais received from the great humanist an almost similar letter. Budé congratulates him particularly on having recovered his books and on being henceforth protected from all violence

“ I have learned from one of the most enlightened and most humane of your brothers, and I made him affirm the news on oath, that they had restored to you your books, your delight, arbitrarily confiscated from you, and that you had been restored to your previous liberty and quiet."

Guillaume Budé was not mistaken. The two Franciscans were out of danger. The affairs of Rabelais were going well. Friar François received from Pope Clement VII an indult authorising him to enter the order of St. Benedict and the Abbey of Maillezais, with the title and habit of a regular Canon and the right to hold benefices. These privileges were not yet sufficient for Rabelais who, but for the hobgoblins, might perhaps have been an excellent monk. But he could not stand the sound of bells and did not like to interrupt his studies to go to matins. He set out on his travels, saying Mass on occasion.

This irregularity was not likely to shock excessively the Bishop of Maillezais, who knew what an exquisite man Friar François was, since he had been a fellow-student of his at La Baumette.

Geoffroy d'Estissac was a young prelate, who was appointed in 1518, when less than twenty-five years old, by a special dispensation, to the see of Maillezais, where he led a lordly and fashionable life. Maillezais, which is situated on a plain in the middle of the Vendean marshes, overlooks one of the two branches formed by the Aulise, a tributary of the Sèvre. There stood an ancient Abbey, raised to a bishopric by Pope John XXII. Geoffroy d'Estissac, who lived in a splendid manner, after the fashion of the Renaissance lords, presented the newly built abbey church with a gateway all glittering with the wonders of the new architecture, and transformed the monastery buildings into a palace in the Italian style, with charming cloisters, a splashing fountain, and broad, noble stairways. Around this beautiful dwelling Geoffroy d'Estissac planted gardens full of flowers and rare plants. On being received at Ligugé, and lodged perhaps in the circular dungeon where they still show his room, Rabelais once more found himself in the congenial company of scholars. He formed a particular bond of friendship with Jean Bouchet, a native of Poitou, like himself, an attorney at Poitiers, author of Annales d'Aquitaine and many other writings in prose and verse. There was good fruit and wine, they say, at Ligugé, but above all there were good books and learned conversations. Rabelais boasted of the wine of Ligugé. Perhaps he was not over-critical. I may say in this connection that I suspect our François of having never known much about wine. He is always talking about bottles, but his bottles were books, and he became intoxicated only with wisdom and sound doctrine.

Geoffroy d'Estissac loved the humanists and did not hate the Reformers. At that time in France there were many bishops and cardinals who protected scholars and facilitated the spread of sacred and profane texts. Up to this date, 1524, the Court was favourable to innovations. The Reformation, which was born in France before Luther, had no greater friend than the gentle and pious sister of the King, Marguerite d'Angoulême, duchesse d'Alençon, subsequently Queen of Navarre. The King himself inclined in that direction. The kings of France have always resisted the Popes as much as possible and François I would probably have remained favourable to the French Reformers to the end, if he had not needed the help of the Holy See against Charles V and the Imperialists

On the other hand, the Sorbonne, the monks and the lower orders clung to the old customs and old beliefs. The common people of the town supported and defended them with a zeal and a fury of which we shall soon have evidence. Consequently, it is not surprising that Friar François, who was suspect to the monks of Fontenay, was favourably treated by the Bishop of Maillezais. Friar François was wonderfully studious. We know from himself that at Ligugé he worked in his bed in his little room. This was not laziness, the room was not heated. At that time people had no other protection from the cold, save the curtains of their bed and the mantelpiece. François Rabelais acquired such learnings as to astonish the most learned of his contemporaries. He became a philosopher, a theologian, a mathematician, a jurist, a musician, an arithmetician, a geometrist, an astronomer, a painter and a poet. In this he was the equal of Erasmus and Budé. But in one respect he is unique, or at least exceedingly rare in his century, his learning was not only from books, but from nature, not literary, but intellectual; not only verbal, but factual and living.

It is not, therefore, surprising that he should have thought of studying medicine as the science which penetrated farthest into the secret of life. At least the hope was permissible at that time of great hope. The School of Medicine at Montpellier was very old. The Arabs and the Jews had brought their teaching there. It was celebrated for its professors, its privileges, and its doctrines François Rabelais went to Montpellier ; but he did not take either the most direct or the shortest route. That was not his method. He liked fine journeys and, as was said of Ulysses, lengthy wanderings. Like Jean de La Fontaine, who was to imitate him in this as in the art of story-telling, he was always ready to take the longest way. In all probability, as he journeyed he visited the towns and universities of France, Paris, Poitiers, Toulouse, Bourges, Orléans, Angers. Finally, on the 17th of September, in the year 1530, he inscribed his name in these terms on the registry of the School of Medicine at Montpellier : “ I, François Rabelais, of Chinon, in the diocese of Tours, have come hither for the purpose of studying medicine and have taken as my sponsor the illustrious Master Jean Schyron, Doctor and Regent of this University I promise to observe all the statutes of the said School of Medicine which are usually kept by those who have in good faith signed their name and taken the oath, according to custom, and to this I have set my signature with my own hand, this 17th day of September, in the year of our Lord, 1530.”

There can be no doubt that François Rabelais was an excellent student of medicine. We know that he acquired a particularly profound knowledge of anatomy and botany. His curiosity, his zeal for learning, were indistinguishable. But he was also eager for pleasure. Having found gay companions at Montpellier, he took a large share in the amusement of the youth of the school. We have it on his own authority that he greatly enjoyed acting in a comedy, or rather a farce, with his fellow-students Antoine de Saporta, Guy Bouguier, Balthazar Noyer, Tolet, Jean Quentin, François Robinet and Jean Perdrier. It was one of those farces of the type of Pathelin, so dear to the people of France in the time of King Louis XII, full of vivid strokes and good comedy Rabelais entitled it himself The Moral Comedy of the Man Who Married a Dumb Wife, and he gives us a summary of it which is sufficient to describe the action The wife was dumb Her good man wanted her to speak. She spoke through the arts of the doctor and the surgeon, who cut the string of her tongue No sooner had she recovered her speech than she spoke so much that her exasperated husband returned to the doctor to ask him to cure this evil, and to make her silent.

“Truly,” replied the doctor, “I have among my arts such remedies as can make women speak I know none that can make them be silent The only remedy against a wife’s chatter is the deafness of her husband”

The poor husband accepted this remedy, since there was no other By means of some charm, the doctors made him deaf The wife, seeing that he did not hear a word, and that she was talking in vain, became mad out of spite at not being able to make herself heard The doctor claimed his fee The husband replied that he could not hear his request. The doctor threw a powder on his back by virtue of which he became insane The insane husband and the mad wife made an agreement to beat the doctor and the surgeon, who lay half dead on the floor That is the end of the comedy. Rabelais says that he never laughed more than at this farce That is not surprising He loved farces and this is an excellent one. What could not but be pleasing to a humanist, there was something of Terence in it. The end is taken from the admirable farce of Pathelin. Molière drew largely from the analysis given by Rabelais for his Doctor in Spite of Himself. There are many celebrated centuries of drama in this students' entertainment.

Amongst the pleasures which Rabelais enjoyed while studying medicine must be mentioned his walks on the Iles d'Or, which are also called Stoechades, and which we call the Iles d'Hyères, which are washed by the blue sea, five leagues from Toulon, all flowering with orange trees, vines, olive trees, ivy, oaks, pines, palms, and rose laurel. He liked those islands so much that later on he decided to call himself their Patriarch, a religious title in use amongst the Christians of the East.

When raised to the rank of Bachelor, according to the custom, he delivered a public lecture and commented upon the Aphorisms of Hippocrates and the Ars Parva of Galen, and he left the school without having obtained his doctorate. Rabelais could never stay long in the same place.

He was drawn to Lyons. Even more than Paris this was a city of printers. Scholars flocked there, certain of finding work and friends. He went there at the beginning of the year 1532. From November of the same year he discharged the duties of doctor at the Hôtel-Dieu, at a salary of forty livres a year.

In medicine we find him torn between two doctrines, the authority of the ancients, which was then supreme (they swore by Hippocrates), and the study of nature, to which his genius constantly turned him. He made dissections, a practice condemned by the Church and disapproved of by custom, and one in which the learned seldom indulged André Vesale, who was still too young, had not yet begun to hunt for corpses beneath the gallows and in the graveyards At the Hôtel-Dieu of Lyons, Rabelais publicly dissected a man who had been hanged Etienne Dolet, who had already made a name for himself amongst the humanists, celebrated this fact as extraordinary and praiseworthy in a discourse in Latin verse which, by a daring fiction, he placed in the mouth of the executed man He made him say .

“ Strangled by the fatal knot, I was hanging miserably on the gallows Unexpected good fortune which I had scarcely dared ask of great Jupiter ! The eyes of a vast assembly are centred upon me ; I am dissected by the most learned of doctors, who will hold up to admiration in the machinery of my body, the incomparable order, the sublime beauty of the structure of the human anatomy, masterpiece of the Creator The crowd is looking, all attention What a signal honour and what excess of glory ! And to think that I might have been the plaything of the winds, the prey of wheeling and rapacious crows ! Ah ! Fate may now do its worst against me I am transported with glory ”

Rabelais was bound in friendship with Etienne Dolet, who was four years younger than he In the course of his work he observed a little fish in which he thought he recognised the small garum, a sort of anchovy which the ancients used in the preparation of a very choice condiment After various trials, he flattered himself that he had reconstructed the formula of the ancient pickle, and, putting it in Latin verse, he sent it to Dolet with a jar of garum. It is wonderful to see the encyclopædic curiosity of the humanists extending to Latin gastronomy and culinary antiquities. Good scholars, with pen in hand they revived the feasts of Lucullus, and in reality regaled themselves poorly on an eel or half an ell of sausage at an eating house. Even then, as often as not, they had to be content with a herring.

At Lyons, François Rabelais divided his attention between the hospital and the shop of Sebastian Gryphius. He was torn between erudition and medicine. Erudition won, at least for a while. He absented himself from the Hôtel-Dieu without leave, and for this offence he was immediately replaced. Then, in order to live, he made books which were sold in the shop in the Rue Mercière, "at the Sign of the Griffin." This Griffin was the emblem of Sebastian Gryphius, printer and bookseller, who had come from Swabia to establish himself in Lyons about 1524, and who, four years later, was celebrated for the beauty of the Greek and Latin texts issued from his presses. Rabelais published with Sebastian Gryphius, in 1532, the Epistolæ medicinales Manardi, which he dedicated to Judge Tiraqueau, and the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, with an epistle to Bishop Geoffroy d'Estissac. He had not forgotten the days of Fontenay-le-Comte and Ligugé. Our author thought that he should publish this edition of the Aphorisms, although there were others in existence, because he had in his possession a beautiful old manuscript of this work, containing abundant glosses. His use of it was more enthusiastic than critical, and he had no scruples in explaining what was already in itself sufficiently clear. If we are to believe M. Jean Plattard, a good judge of such matters, François had still much to learn in matters of erudition before taking his place amongst the great humanists of the period.

At the same time he published two fragments of Roman law, the Testament of Lucius Cuspidius and a Contract of Sale, with a preliminary Græco-Latin epistle to the defender of women, Aymery Bouchard, now King's Counsel and Master of Requests. In this François had not made a very fortunate choice. Both documents were spurious, very spurious, absolutely spurious. The Testament of Cuspidius had been fabricated a century earlier by Pompeius Lætus and the Contract of Sale was the work of Jovianus Pontanus, who had made it the prologue to a comic dialogue entitled Actus. How could so clever a man make such a mistake? He loved antiquity, love blinds and enthusiasm is injurious to criticism. We owe our knowledge of the ancients to these great men of the Renaissance. Let us not employ against them what they have taught us. Since the contemporaries of Rabelais do not seem to have very generally contested the authenticity of these two documents, let us not reproach the editor too seriously with an error which his own period had difficulty in recognising. In short, if the great son of Touraine was not sufficiently suspicious of the compatriots of Poggio, let us not go to the opposite extreme, let us beware of being too cautious, and let us not attribute to Poggio himself the works of Tacitus.

In the sixteenth century the humanists formed a sort of State in the world, the Republic of Letters. The expression dates from that period. Old Erasmus of Rotterdam was the prince of that spiritual republic. Rabelais, who had once so ardently desired a letter from the illustrious Guillaume Budé, seized the opportunity which was offered to him in 1532, at Lyons, to correspond with the great Erasmus. A prelate and friend of letters, like so many others at that time, Georges d'Armagnac, Bishop of Rodez, whose acquaintance he had just made, commissioned him in the month of November to deliver to Erasmus a copy of the works of Flavius Josephus. Rabelais accompanied the package with a letter in Latin to the great man, who was ending a life of labour and glory in Bâle. For some reason which has never yet been explained, so far as I know, this letter is addressed to the unknown name of Bernard de Salignac. But there is no doubt that Erasmus was the person for whom it was intended.

The following are the passages most worthy of interest, literally translated :

“ I have eagerly seized this opportunity, O humanest of Fathers, to prove to you by grateful homage my profound respect for you and my filial piety. My Father, did I say ? I should call you Mother, did your indulgence allow it. All that we know of mothers, who nourish the fruit of their womb before seeing it, before knowing even what it will be, who protect it, who shelter it against the inclemency of the air, that you have done for me, for me whose face was not known to you, and whose obscure name could not impress you. You have brought me up, you have fed me at the chaste breasts of your divine knowledge, all that I am, all that I am worth, I owe to you alone. If I did not publish it aloud, I should be the most ungrateful of men. Salutations once more, beloved Father, honour of your country, support of letters, unconquerable champion of truth."

This letter expresses in the grandiloquent manner of the period sentiments that were very true and very sincere. Rabelais was very familiar with the writings of Erasmus, especially he had read and re-read the Apophthegms and the Adages; and often when he was writing he would reproduce some passage from these two works. He felt all the more free to do so because at that time to imitate was praiseworthy and it was an honour to prove that one was well read.

While he was accomplishing works of erudition, which gave him a place of honour amongst men of letters, he gave a few hours from time to time to other works which the learned despised but which we nowadays find well worthy of interest. He made predictions and almanacs in the vulgar tongue for the common reader, and into these he put much more of himself than into his learned publications. Into them he gathered a great harvest of pleasantries and vulgar jokes, and also maxims of the highest wisdom. His prophecies were simply jibes and sneers at the astrologers and soothsayers. He made fun of those who drew horoscopes and gave excellent reasons for his incredulity concerning them. "The greatest folly in the world," he said, "is to think that there are stars for kings, popes and great lords, rather than for the poor and suffering as if new stars had been created since the time of the Flood, or since Romulus or Pharamond, at the new creation of kings."

In these popular little books he constantly expresses the idea of a God by whom the universe is governed. Announcing in the almanac for 1533 the future changes of kingdoms and religions, he hastens to add :

“ These be secrets of the close Council of the Eternal King, who disposes everything that is and that is done, according to his own free will and good pleasure, about which 'twere better to say nothing and to adore them in silence ”

By 1532 Rabelais had accomplished a task which was even more humble, but which was to lead him to make the most peculiar, the most astonishing, the most marvellous book in the world. On a popular theme he had written a story for the entertainment of ignorant and simple people, the story of a giant, The Great and Inestimable Chronicles of Gargantua. This Gargantua was not a character invented by Rabelais. His fame extended back into the mists of time ; his popularity was enormous, especially in the country districts. In every province of France the peasants could relate his incredible feats of strength, his miraculous appetite. In a thousand places people pointed out enormous stones, sections of rock, which he had brought there a hillock or a hill which had fallen from his basket. The story of Rabelais entitled The Great and Inestimable Chronicles is just a hodge-podge of traditional funny stories which had long since become popular. He did not take it to the learned printer, Gryphius, but to a bookseller at Lyons called François Juste, where more of them were sold in one month than Bibles in nine years.

How was Rabelais soon led to make of this same Gargantua and his son Pantagruel the weirdest, the merriest, the strangest of novels, a work which resembles no other and can be compared only to the Satyricon of Petronius, to the Gran Tacaño of Francisco de Quevedo, to the Don Quixote of Cervantes, to Swift's Gulliver, and to the novels of Voltaire? It is not possible to answer this question as precisely and as accurately as one might wish. Like the sources of the Nile for a long time, the origins of Gargantua and Pantagruel are unknown to us. On this subject I cannot do better than quote the prudent words of the most learned editor of Rabelais, the late lamented Marty-Laveaux:

"It is guessed rather than known that Rabelais re-wrote for the publisher François Juste in Lyons a traditional and long popular joke, which he entitled The Great and Inestimable Chronicles of the Great and Enormous Giant Gargantua, that afterwards, amused by his subject, by the success of the little book, he added, as a sequel, his Pantagruel, and that finally he substituted for the first formless attempt a new and definitive Gargantua, which became the first book of the novel, as Pantagruel was the second."

Such are the probabilities. Without entering into an arid and confused discussion on this subject, which would lead to nothing certain, we shall study the first two books and, while refraining from deciding on our own authority whether the second book was composed before the first, we shall examine the latter first of all. The order of the material, although of slight importance in this author, makes this necessary. For it is certain that Pantagruel is the son of Gargantua. This relationship cannot be doubted. We are about to make the acquaintance of these two horrible giants, who are, at bottom, very decent people, and live in their company, which is respectable and even exemplary. With them at every moment we shall pass from the amusing to the serious, from the absurd to the sublime We shall taste alternately attic salt and kitchen salt I believe that the taste of both will be enjoyed But one thing I guarantee is that, in the company of the giants and their friends, nothing will be heard (I shall see to it) which might offend the most chaste, the most timid, and the most delicate ears. I shall be prudent, I shall . . . I must stop. It might seem, in the end, as if I promised too much.

THE FIRST BOOK

THE FIRST BOOK

FOR the genealogy of Gargantua the author refers us to the great chronicle of Pantagruel In connection with this birth he makes a remark upon the greatness and decline of royal families .

“ I think many are at this day emperours, kings, dukes, princes and popes on the earth whose extraction is from some porters and—pardon—peddlers, as, on the contrary, many are now poor wandring beggars, wretched and miserable, who are descended of the blood and lineage of great kings and emperours And to give you some hint concerning myself, I cannot think but I am come of the race of some rich king or prince in former times, for never yet saw you any man that had a greater desire to be a king, and to be rich, than I have, and that onely that I may make good chear, do nothing, nor care for any single thing, and plentifully enrich my friends and all honest and learned men." At this point, it may be thought that the mind of Rabelais is revealed, that this great mocker respects neither prince, nor king, nor pope, that he sees far beyond the Renaissance and the Reformation, right down into modern times. Oh ! How wrong that would be, and how mistaken ! Rabelais was very far indeed from thinking anything of the sort. What he says here is quite vulgar and quite popular, and quite common, without being any the worse for that. Here our author merely says very amusingly what had been said before him by all the good preachers, monks like himself. These are gospel words. Nothing is further from the mind of Rabelais than to try to diminish royal authority. King François had no more obedient and respectful subject than Friar François. I say this so that we may be careful not to take a commonplace for a novelty, and also that we may notice how commonplaces are sometimes very daring.

Let us return to our book. The father of Gargantua is called Grandgousier ; his mother Gargamelle ; she was the daughter of the King of the Parpaillots. Grandgousier, we are told, was a good fellow in his time, he loved to drink neat and to eat salt meat, being always well furnished with gammons of bacon, both of Bayonne and Mayence, with store of dried neats' tongues.

One holiday, when they had eaten three hundred and sixty-seven thousand and fourteen beeves and danced upon the grass,

Gargantua issued from his mother's ears Seventeen thousand, nine hundred and thirteen cows were appointed to furnish him with milk, but he preferred wine to milk

When he grew up, his father had him dressed in white and blue nine hundred ells of linen for his shirt, eight hundred and thirteen ells of white satin for his doublet, and for his points fifteen hundred and nine dogskins and a half "Then was it that men began to tie their breeches to their doublets and not their doublets to their breeches for it is against nature, as hath most amply been showed by Occam upon the Exponibles of Master Hautechaussade" Occam was a rather Reformist theologian of his time and little inclined towards the Pope, but he practised Scholasticism, that was sufficient for Rabelais to make fun of him Scholasticism was his bête noire.

When the time came to give Gargantua a tutor, his father chose a great doctor of theology, Master Tubal Holophernes, who taught him his A B C so well that he could say it by heart backwards, and who instructed him in the old Scholasticism This great doctor having died, an old coughing fellow named Master Jobelin Bride, succeeded him and, using the same method, reduced instruction to exercises of memory The child studied with zeal, he learnt easily, but the more he studied the more he became foolish, doted and blockish. His father complained of this to his friend the Viceroy of Papeligosse, who frankly replied to him.

"It were better for him to learne nothing at all, than to be taught such like books under such schoolmasters, because their knowledge was nothing but brutishness, and their wisdom but blunt foppish toys, serving only to bastardise good and noble spirits and to corrupt all the flower of youth ”

That night at supper the Viceroy sent for one of his pages called Eudemon, his hair in good order, handsome in his apparel, very spruce, comely in his behaviour and more like a little angel than a man , then he said to Grandgousier

“ Do you see this young boy ? He is not as yet sixteen years old ; let us try (if it please you), what difference there is betwixt the knowledge of the doting Mateologians of old time, and the young lads that are now ” (the Middle Ages and the Renaissance are thus confronted, or, to be more accurate, Scholasticism and the Humanities). The trial pleased Grandgousier. Eudemon, with his cap in his hand, a clear and open countenance, ruddy lips, his eyes steady, and his looks fixed upon Gargantua, with youthful modesty began his compliment, and when he had well and duly commended him, he placed himself entirely at his service All this was delivered with proper gestures, distinct enunciation, eloquent delivery and in very ornate Latin After which Gargantua’s only reply was to cry like a cow and to hide his face in his cap It was not possible to draw one word from him To this scene in the old novel, a historic scene corresponds, which took place in France under Louis XIV The two scenes improve by being compared I shall remind you that the young Duc de Berry, who had been educated in princely fashion by some Tubal Holophernes and some Jobelin Bride of the seventeenth century one day behaved before the Parliament in a manner which recalled that of the young Gargantua when saluted by Eudemon. This is how St. Simon relates the session, when the prince renounced the crown of Spain.

"The first president presented his compliments to the Duc de Berry. When he had finished it was the Prince's turn to reply. He half took off his hat, promptly put it on again, looked at the first president and said 'Sir !'. After a moment's pause he repeated . 'Sir'. He looked around at those present and again said 'Sir'. He turned to the Duc d'Orléans, both of them being as red as poppies, then to the first president, and finally he stopped short, without being able to utter a single word except 'Sir'. . . In the end, the first president, seeing that there was nothing else to be done, terminated the cruel scene by taking off his hat to the Duc de Berry and bowing low, as if the reply were finished, and immediately made a signal to the courtiers that they could talk.

"On his return to Versailles the Princesse de Montauban came forward to greet him, without knowing anything of what had happened, and she began to cry out, as soon as she saw the Duke, how charmed she had been by the grace and eloquence with which he had spoken to the Parliament. He blushed with vexation and did not reply, finally, unable to restrain himself further, he took M. de St. Simon to his quarters, began to weep, to shout, and to complain of the King, and of his tutor.

" 'Their only aim has been to make me stupid,' he cried, weeping with rage, 'and to stifle everything I might have been, they have taught me nothing but gambling and hunting and they have succeeded in making a fool and an idiot of me, an utterly incapable person who will never be good for anything' ”

The two scenes are alike. But it must be admitted to the credit of Rabelais that the scene of Gargantua and Eudemon is just as true and living as the other.

Grandgousier, furious at seeing his son so badly educated, was ready to kill Master Jobelin. Then, his anger having subsided, for he was a decent man, he ordered his wages to be paid to the old coughing fellow, that they should whittle him up soundly, and give him leave to go to all the devils in hell.

When Master Jobelin had left, on the advice of the Viceroy, Grandgousier confided the education of Gargantua to a young scholar named Ponocrates, who was the tutor of Eudemon. No better choice could have been made. And it was agreed that the two young princes should go with Ponocrates to Paris in order to profit by the advantages which that city offers to those who wish to study.

During the voyage Gargantua once more became the horrible giant of legend. He rode on a Numidian mare whose tail was so long that by whisking it a few times she knocked down a forest. Beauce at that time was covered with trees. When the mare of Gargantua drove the flies away, Beauce immediately became the bare plain which we know.

According to our author, Gargantua visited the city and was seen and greatly admired by everybody ; “ for the people of Paris are so sottish, so badot, so foolish and fond by nature, that a juggler, a carrier of indulgences, a sumpter-horse, or a mule with cymbals, a blinde fidler in the middle of a crosse lane, shall draw a greater confluence of people together than an evangelical preacher ”

Gargantua sat down upon the towers of Nôtre Dame There he saw the great bells and made them sound very harmoniously While he was doing this it came to his mind that they would serve very well to hang about his mare's neck, and he carried them to his lodgings The Parisians, excited by the loss of their bells, assembled at the foot of the Tower of Nesle and, after noisy deliberation, they decided to send the oldest and most respected master of the faculty, Janotus de Bragmardo, to claim them

Master Janotus, preceded by three beadles, betook himself to the lodgings of Gargantua On seeing them, Ponocrates at first believed that they were maskers, but, on learning who they were and what they wanted, he informed Gargantua, who had them brought to the goblet-office, where they drank like theologians Meanwhile the son of Grandgousier returned the bells unknown to Master Janotus who pronounced a gallant oration in asking for them .

“ It were but reason that you should restore to us our bells ; for we have great need of them if you restore them unto us at my request, I shall gaine by it six basketfuls of sauciges, and a fine pair of breeches, which will do my legs a great deal of good, or else they will not keep their promise to me ha, ha, a paire of breeches is not so easily got, I have experience of it my self ”

To this first argument he adds others of a more general nature .

“ A town without bells is like a blinde man without a staffe, an asse without a crocker and a cow without cymbals . . . etc. . . . ”

This harangue made everybody laugh heartily, and Master Janotus, seeing them laugh, began to laugh more loudly than they. Thus simple people are happy : everything pleases them Gargantua caused this fine orator to be given kindling wood, wine, a feather bed, a dish, and seven ells of black cloth to make breeches. Whereupon Master Janotus went to the faculty to claim the payment which had been promised him But they gave him nothing for the reason that he had already been paid.

Ponocrates, who was an excellent educator, began by making his pupil forget everything that the old Sorbonnists, Tubal Holophernes and Jobelin Bride had taught him For that purpose he purged him with hellebore Then he set him to such a course of study that not an hour of the day was lost Gargantua awoke at four o'clock in the morning. While they were rubbing him, a young page read to him a passage from the Holy Scriptures While he was dressing, his tutor explained the obscure and difficult points in his previous reading. Then they went and examined the face of the sky, the position of the sun and moon Gargantua allowed himself to be dressed, combed, trimmed and perfumed while repeating the lessons of the day before, not without drawing therefrom practical conclusions In this way he was fully dressed and was read to for three hours After which they went and played ball and tennis, leaving off when they pleased, or when they began to perspire abundantly

After being well rubbed, they recited some passages from the lesson of the day while waiting for dinner.

At the beginning of the meal they listened to the reading of some romance of chivalry. Sometimes the reading continued after the wine had been served, sometimes the guests discoursed merrily together, even this pleasure was profitable, because they discussed the properties and virtues of everything that was served at table, of the bread, the wine, the water, the salt, the meats, fish, fruit, herbs, roots, and in this connection they invoked the testimony of the ancients, Pliny, Ælian, Aristotle, Athenæus and Dioscorides, whom Don Quixote was to read later on with the commentaries of Dr Laguna. Afterwards the conversation turned to the lesson of the morning and they all gave thanks unto God.

When they rose from the table, cards were brought, not to play, but to discover mathematical tricks, they designed geometrical and astronomical figures, they sang in four or five parts, played the lute, the spinet, the harp, the flute, the viola and the trombone. This recreation lasted one hour. It was followed by three hours of study, reading and writing. They had to practice making antique letters, that is to say, the Italic characters brought into favour by the great Hellenist printer of Venice, Aldo Manuzi, Gothic was left to the pedants of the Sorbonne and to the Scholastics.

Having done this, the young princes left their house. A young gentleman of Touraine, named Gymnast, gave writing lessons to Eudemon and to Gargantua. Gargantua rides a barbed steed, a jennet, a cob, and not that terrible mare who knocked down the forest of Beauce in driving away the flies with her tail. Is Gargantua no longer a giant? A little earlier he was sitting on the towers of Nôtre Dame; now he is sitting on the scholar's bench and at the table of Christians. This need not surprise us. The wise man should be surprised at nothing. Gargantua changes his stature at every moment. Rabelais has no difficulty in giving him the stature suitable to every situation: he is a giant when he is the popular hero of the old stories, a prince of respectable proportions and pleasant mien when he mingles with life and is introduced into the human comedy by the profoundest of comic geniuses.

After riding, the son of Grandgousier indulged in all the exercises useful for the training of a warrior. He hunted, swam, shouted like all the devils in hell, to exercise his breast and lungs, swung dumb-bells and collected plants.

While recapitulating the studies of the day they awaited supper, which was plentiful and accompanied by learned and useful conversation. After having given thanks, they had music; they played cup and ball and, on occasion, paid a visit to some scholar or traveller.

At night they observed the position of the stars in the sky. They briefly recapitulated everything that they had read, seen, known, done and heard during the course of the day, and after praying to God and recommending themselves to His clemency, they went to bed.

When the weather was raining they exercised indoors. They amused themselves by trussing hay, splitting and sawing wood, threshing corn in the barn and, instead of herbarising, they visited the various tradesmen, druggists, apothecaries, and even the mountebanks and quacksalvers, for Rabelais believed that something could be learned even from charlatans and jugglers

Those were days well filled and varied, with plenty of work and not too much fatigue. A wiser and better system of education cannot be conceived. A French statesman, François Guizot, who was undoubtedly rather too austere and Protestant to enjoy much, and particularly to admit, without reservations, a mind excessively joyful, but who, in his youth, had applied his great intelligence to questions of pedagogy, François Guizot could recognise the merits of our author as an educationalist and teacher. In 1812, he wrote in an educational review these lines, which have since been reprinted in his works

“Rabelais recognised and pointed out the vices of the systems and methods of education in his day, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, he perceived almost everything of any sense and value in the works of the modern philosophers, amongst others of Locke and Rousseau”

M. Jean Fleury, in his book on Rabelais, very ingeniously compares Master Jobelin and Ponocrates with two great prelates of the seventeenth century, Court tutors. Disrespectful to the one and flattering to the other, this parallel is rather unexpected so far as both of them are concerned. I shall quote it, because it is curious and fundamentally more just than appears at first sight, making allowances for the restrictions and modifications made by the author

“ Within certain limits the family of Louis XIV offers us an example of a prince educated after the manner of Gargantua, according to the traditional method, and of a prince educated like Eudemon, according to a more rational method. The Dauphin, educated by Bossuet, remained a deplorable mediocrity ; the Duc de Bourgogne, educated by Fénelon, became a remarkable man. No doubt that depended upon the nature of the pupils, but it depended still more upon the method of education. Bossuet applied the system of Jobelin . learning many things by heart. Fénelon approximated to the system of Poncecrates , he placed his pupil in direct contact with things, and, in order to raise him to his own level, he began by himself becoming young and ignorant like him. The two systems are written down in the works composed by the two Bishops for their pupils. Bossuet presents knowledge in all its dryness and austerity. One has merely to look at his Histoire Universelle, his Politique tirée de l'Ecriture Sainte, his Connaissance de Dieu et de soi-même. Do they contain a single word which supposes a young and ignorant listener ? Does the illustrious author descend a little from the heights, in order to come within the reach of his pupil ? Never. If he says so, the pupil must believe him , he must learn without understanding for a second, unless it be later on. His pupil took him at his word , he did not take the trouble to understand what his teacher did not deign to explain to him. His mind remained in swaddling clothes and never grew up.

“ Fénelon, on the contrary, begins by placing himself on his pupil's level , he composes fables to amuse while instructing him, fables drawn, for the most part, from the circumstances of the young prince's life In order to teach him history, he does not start by placing in his hands a dry and systematic book , he talks to him about great men and sometimes, in his Dialogues des morts, for example, he allows him to be present at the conversations between them. The child's mind blossoms under this benevolent influence ; in this atmosphere of patience and love the young prince's intelligence grows He is morally transformed and, if it had been given to him to reign, he would have become a remarkable king, not so brilliant, perhaps, but more sensible than Louis XIV The Dauphin, on the throne, would have been inferior to Louis XV

“ Bossuet succeeded better than Master Jobelin Fénelon did not succeed so well as Ponocrates, but at all events the two systems confronted each other They were put into practice by two equally eminent men and, on a small scale, they produced the results announced by the author of Gargantua ”

Even to-day the educators of our youth would have much to learn from the old jester

While Gargantua was studying in Paris under such good auspices, the affair of the cakes broke out at Chinon This is what happened During the vintage season, at the beginning of autumn, while the shepherds of the countryside were looking after the vines, some inhabitants of the village of Lerné happened to pass along the highway, driving into the city ten or twelve horses, loaded with those cakes so dear to the people of Touraine and Poitou, which they call fouaces. The shepherds politely asked these people to sell them the cakes at the market price. The only reply of the cake-bakers to this request was insults ; they called the shepherds by various slanderous epithets louts, varlets, and knaves.

One of the shepherds, named Forgier, reproached them with their conduct

“ Come hither,” replied the cake-baker Marquet, “ I will give thee some cakes ”

Forgier then offered him a piece of money, thinking to receive some cakes. But Marquet, instead of cakes, gave him a lash of his whip across the legs. The shepherd shouted “ Murder ! ” and threw his stick at Marquet’s head, who fell off his mare. The farmers of Grandgousier, who were shaking down nuts close by, came running when they heard the cries, and thrashed the cake-bakers as if they were green rye. The latter, taking flight, the farmers, shepherds and shepherdesses pursued them, stopped them and took from them four or five dozen cakes, for which they paid the ordinary price.

Then they ate their cakes without remorse and, having thoroughly enjoyed them, they danced to the sound of a bagpipe.

The cake-bakers returned at once to Lerné and lodged a complaint with their king, Picrochole, against the shepherds and farmers of Grandgousier. In revenge for the affront Picrochole immediately assembled his army and invaded the territory of Grandgousier. Thus a dreadful war broke out. The soldiers destroyed and scattered everything on their path, they spared neither rich nor poor, neither sacred nor profane places Thus they pillaged the Abbey of Seullé or Seully, the same place where François Rabelais had been sent about the age of 9 or 10 to become a bird, that is to say, a monk The good monks, not knowing where to turn, decided to make a fine procession in order to deflect the fury of their enemies The step was praiseworthy, but it was not certain, for who can foresee the designs of the Lord ? Who can hope to change them ? Now, there was an adroit and frisky young monk in the Abbey, called John of the Trencherites Hearing the noise which the soldiers were making in the vineyard, Friar John went to see what they were doing and, seeing that they were gathering the grapes, he ran to the choir of the church, where the monks were singing to appease the Lord

“ By the virtue of God, why do you not sing Paniers, farewell Vintage is done ? ” he cried

At these words the Prior raised an indignant voice

“ What should this drunken fellow do here, let him be carried to prison for troubling the divine service ”

“ Nay, the wine service,” replied Friar John, “ let us behave ourselves so, that it be not troubled , for you your self, my Lord Prior, love to drink of the best, and so doth every honest man ”

As he said this, he threw off his great habit, seized the staff of the cross which was made of the heart of a sorb tree, and laid so briskly upon his enemies that he routed them all, to the number of thirteen thousand, six hundred and twenty-two, besides the women and little children

On hearing of the invasion and ravaging of his lands, Grandgousier was filled with astonishment and grief. He was a good king.

“ Alas, alas (said he), what is this, good people ? Picrochole, my ancient friend of old time, of my own kindred and alliance, comes he to invade me ? What moves him ? What provokes him ? What sets him on ? My God, my Saviour, help me, inspire me, and advise me what I shall do I protest, I swear before Thee, I never did him or his subjects any damage or displeasure ; on the contrary, I have succoured and supplied him with men, money, friendship and counsel. That he hath, therefore at this nick of time so outraged and wronged me, it cannot be but by the malevolent and wicked spirit . . . ah, my good people, my friends and my faithful servants, must I hinder you from helping me ? I must (I see it well) load with armes my poor, weary and feeble shoulders ; and take in my trembling hands the lance and horseman’s mace, to succour and protect my honest subjects : reason will have it so ; for by their labour am I entertained, and with their sweat am I nourished, I, my children and my family This notwithstanding, I will not undertake warre until I have first tried all the wayes and means of peace.”

Words of wisdom ! Happy would be the nations if princes always thought thus !

The good king sent to Picrochole his Master of Requests, Ulrich Gallet, to inquire into the reasons for the war, and he wrote to his son Gargantua, calling him back to his threatened country.

Ulrich Gallet delivered a beautiful Ciceronian speech to Picrochole. The King of Lerne answered him outrageously in these few words . “ They will knead cakes for you ! ”

To these threats from an angry prince the holy king, Grandgousier, replied only with further offers of peace Like Idomeneus in the ninth Book of Télémaque . “ Idomeneus is ready to perish or to conquer , but he loves peace more than the most signal victory. He would be ashamed to be afraid of being conquered, but he is afraid of being unjust ”

Picrochole refused to receive the envoys of Grandgousier

“ These clowns are afraid to some purpose,” said Captain Touquedillon, who commanded his armies “ Grandgousier is trembling in his boots ” Picrochole’s councillors promised him the conquest of the universe The imprudent monarch had no difficulty in believing them The scene deserves to be quoted in its entirety .

“ ‘ Sire, this day we make you the happiest, the most warlike and chivalrous prince that ever was since the death of Alexander of Macedonia.’

“ ‘ Be covered ’ (said Picrochole).

“ ‘ Grammercie (said they) we do but our duty the manner is thus, you shall leave some captain here to have the charge of this garrison, with a party competent for keeping of the place, which besides its natural strength is made stronger by the rampiers and fortresses of your devising Your army you are to divide into two parts, as you know very well how to do One part thereof shall fall upon Grandgousier and his forces, by it shall he be easily at the very first shock routed, and then shall you get money by heaps, for the clown hath store of ready coine · clown we call him, because a noble and generous prince hath never a penny, and that to hoard up treasure is but a clownish trick The other part of the army in the mean time shall draw towards Onys, Xaintonge, Angoulesme and Gascony : then march to Perigourt, Medos and Elanes, taking wherever you come without resistance, townes, castles and forts afterwards to Bayonne, St John de Luz, to Fuentarabia, where you shall seize upon all the ships, and coasting along Galicia and Portugal, shall pillage all the maritime places, even unto Lisbone, where you shall be supplied with all the necessaries befitting a conqueror By copsodie Spain will yield, for they are but a race of loobies . then are you to passe by the streights of Gibraltar, where you shall erect two pillars more stately than those of Hercules, to the perpetual memory of your name, and the narrow entrance there shall be called the Picrocholinal sea Having passed the Picrocholinal sea, behold, Barbarossa yields himself your slave.’

“ ‘ I will (said Picrochole), give him fair quarter and spare his life ’

“ ‘ Yea (said they), so that he be content to be christened ’

“ ‘ You shall conquer all Barbary ; you shall take in to your hands Majorca, Minorca, Sardinia, Corsica ; going alongst on the left hand, you shall rule all Gallia, Narbonensis, Provence, Genua, Florence, Luca, and then God bi wy Rome The poor Pope is already dying with fear ’

“ ‘By my faith (said Picrochole), I will not then kiss his pantuffle ’

“ ‘Italy being thus taken, behond Naples, Calabria, Apulia and Sicilie, all ransacked, and Malta too I wish the pleasant knights of the Rhodes heretofore would come to resist you ’

“ ‘ I would (said Picrochole), very willingly go to Loretta ’

“ ‘No, no (said they), that shall be at our return , from thence we will take Candia, Cyprus, Rhodes, and the Cyclade Islands, and set upon Morea It is ours by St Treman, the Lord preserve Jerusalem , for the great Soldan is not comparable to you in power ’

“ ‘ I will then (said he), cause Solomon’s temple to be built ’

“ ‘ No (said they), not yet, have a little patience, stay a while, be never too sudden in your enterprises It is requisite that you first have the Lesser Asia, Craia, Lycia, Panphilia, Cilicia, Lydia, Phrygia, Nysia, even unto Euphrates ’

“ ‘ Shall we see (said Picrochole), Babylon and Mt Sinai ? ’

“ ‘There is no need (said they), at this time , have we not hurried up and down, travelled and toyled enough, in having transfreted and passed over the Hircanian sea, marched alongst the two Armenias, and the three Arabias ? ’

“ ‘By my faith (said he), we have played the fooles, and are undone . ha’ poor soules ’

“ ‘ What’s the matter ? ’ (said they)

“ ‘ What shall we have (said he), to drink, in these deserts ? ’

“ ‘ We have already (said they), given order for that In the Siriack sea you have 9,014 great ships laden with the best wines in the world : they arrived at Port Joppa, there they found two and twenty thousand camels, and sixteen hundred elephants, which you shall have taken at one hunting when you entered into Lybia : and, besides this, you had all the Mecca caravan. Did not they furnish you sufficiently with wine ? ’

“ ‘ Yes, but (said he), we did not drink it fresh ’

“ ‘ By the vertue (said they), not of a fish, a valiant man, a conquerour, who pretends and aspires to the monarchy of the world, cannot alwayes have his ease. God be thanked, that you and your men are come safe and sound unto the banks of the river Tigris.’

“ ‘ But (said he), what doth that part of our army in the mean time, which overthrows that unworthy swill-pot, Grandgousier ? ’

“ ‘ They are not idle (said they), we shall meet with them by and by, they shall have won you Britany, Normandy, Flanders, Haynault, Brabant, Artois, Holland, Zealand ; they have passed the Rhine over the bellies of the Switsers and Lanskenets, and a party of these hath subdued Luxumberg, Lorrain, Champagne and Savoy even to Lions, in which place they have met with your forces, returning from the naval conquests of the Mediterranean sea and have rallied again in Bohemia, after they had plundered and sacked Suevia, Wittenberg, Bavaria, Austria, Moravia, and Styria. Then they set fiercely together upon Lubeck, Norway, Swedenland, and Greenland, even unto the frozen sea . this done, they conquered the isles of Orkney, and subdued Scotland, England, and Ireland. From thence, sailing to the sandie sea, and by the Sarmates, they have vanquished and overcome Prussia,

Poland, Lituania, Russia, Walachia, Transilvania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Turqueland, and are now at Constantinople ’

“ ‘ Come (said Picrochole), let us go joyn with them quickly, for I will be emperour of Trebezonde also ’

“ ‘ Shall we not kill all these dogs, Turks and Mahumetans ? And you shall give their goods and lands to such as shall have served you honestly ’

“ ‘ Reason (said he), will have it so, that is but just, I give unto you the Caramania, Surie, and all the Palestine ’

“ ‘ Ha, sir (said they), it is out of your goodnesse Grammercie, God grant you may always prosper ’

“ There was there present at that time an old gentleman well experienced in the warres, a sterne souldier, and who had been in many great hazards, named Ecephron, who hearing this discourse, said

“ ‘ I do greatly doubt that all this enterprise will be like the tale or interlude of the pitcher full of milk wherewith, a shoemaker made himself rich in conceit, but, when the pitcher was broken, he had not whereupon to dine what do you pretend by these large conquests ? What shall be the end of so many labours and crosses ? ’

“ ‘ Thus it shall be (said Picrochole), that when we are returned, we shall sit down, rest, and be merry ’

“ ‘ But (said Ecephron), if by chance you should never come back, for the voyage is long and dangerous, were it not better for us to take our rest now ? ’ ”

This marvellous dialogue, full of broad and subtle humour, this scene which flows abundantly and rapidly. is one of the finest flights of the rich genius of Rabelais. Nevertheless, the idea, the structure of the scene is not his. He took it from the conversation between Pyrrhus and Cineas, as reported by Plutarch in the Life of the Tyrant of Epirus.

This original must be read, in order to admire all the more the richness of the copy, to appreciate better, if I may so express it, the originality of the imitation. I will quote this passage from Plutarch for it is excellent in itself. I shall take it from the translation of Jacques Amyot, because it is very agreeable, and in order to have an opportunity of comparing the style of Rabelais with that of a writer who is a few years later than he, and who contributed, as he did, to the perfection of the French language. Here is the passage from Plutarch; it is short, and I will first mention its brevity as an element of the comparison.

“ Cineas perceiving that Pyrrus was marvellously bent to these wars of Italy, finding him one day at leisure, discoursed with him in this sort. It is reported, and it please your majesty that the Romaines are very good men of war, and that they command many valiant and warlike nations: if it please the gods we do overcome them, what benefit shall we have of that victory?”

“ Pyrrus answered him again, thou doest ask me a question that is manifest of it selfe: for when we have once overcome the Romaines there can neither Grecian nor barbarous cities in all the countrey withstand us, but we shall straight conquer all the rest of Italy, with ease: whose greatnesse, wealth, and power, no man knoweth better then my selfe “Cineas pausing a while, replied and when we have taken Italy, what shall we do then ?

“Pyrrus not finding his meaning yet, sayd unto him . Sicilia as thou knowest, is hard adioyning to it, and doth as it were offer it self unto us, and is a marvellous populous and rich land, and easie to be taken for all the cities within the land are one against another, having no head that governes them since Agathocles died, more than orators only that are their counsellors, who will soone be won “Indeed it is likely which your grace speaketh, quoth Cineas but when we have won Sicilia, shall then our wars take end ?

“If the gods were pleased, sayd Pyrrus, that victorie were achieved, the way were then broad open for us to attaine great conquests For who would not afterwards go into Africke and so to Carthage, which also will be an easie conquest, since Agathocles secretly flying from Syracuse, and having passed the seas with a few ships, had almost taken it ? And that once conquered, it is most certaine there durst not one of all our enemies that now do daily vex and trouble us, lift up their heads or hands against us.

“No surely, says Cineas , for it is a cleare case, that with so great a power we may easily recover the realm of Macedon againe, and command all Greece besides, without let of any But when we have all in our hands, what shall we do in the end ?

“Then Pyrrus laughing, told him againe we will then (good Cineas) be quiet, and take our ease, and make feasts every day, and be as merry one with another, as we can possible Cineas, having brought him to that point, sayd againe to him . My Lord, what letteth us now to be quiet, and merry together, sith we enjoy that presently without further travell and trouble, which we will now go seeke for abroad, with such shedding of blood, and so manifest danger ? And yet we know not whether ever we shall attaine unto it, after we have both suffered, and caused others to suffer infinite sorrowes and troubles ”

Such is the graceful and clear stream which Rabelais flooded with the impetuous torrent of his inspiration. Boileau, in his turn, drew from the same passage in Plutarch the best lines in his Epistle to the King .

“ Why all these elephants ? This train and host ?
 These ships prepar’d to quit the crowded coast ? ’
 To Pyrrhus said a sage, whom oft he heard
 And loved Yet never did enough regard
 The King too mad, the councillor too wise,
 This shews the danger, and that shuts his eyes
By Empire and by Fame I’m call’d to Rome,
And fly from an inglorious ease at home ;
Thither I go— The boastful Prince replies “ For what ? A siege ? A glorious enterprise Worthy alone of Philip’s son and you ,
 What shall we, Sir, when Rome is taken, do ? ”
We’ll then with ease all Italy subdue
 “ Yours I allow that Italy may be,
 But what will you do next ? ” Hate Sicily ,
She’ll soon surrender, nor will Syracuse

RABELAIS

" Here do you stop, my Lord ? " *A tempting gale
Presents, and thence we will to Carthage sail*

Can Carthage deal with our victorious pow'rs ?

Or long resist our arms when Rome is ours ?

Say what can stop us ? When the way's so fair ?

All Africa will be mine without a war

" I understand you, Sir When we have past

The Lybian Desert and Ægyptian waste

When we've enslav'd the Arabs in our way,

Ganges and Indus shall your laws obey

And Scythians yet untam'd confess your sway

When this vast hemisphere is ours, what then,

Shall we not see Epirus once again ? "

Yes, yes, victorious and content, we there

Will live the life of gods, and laugh at care

No time for anything but joy allow

" What hinders, Sir, but you may do it now ?

Why should you for the joy of laughing roam ?

What lets, but you may laugh your fill at home ?

Who, or what dares deny you that delight ?

Stay where you are, and laugh from morn to night "

These lines are solid and well turned, but how far superior is the prose of Rabelais in abundance, colour, movement and life ! In a word, how much more poetic ! But let us resume the story of the great Picrocholinal War

Young Gargantua, who has resumed his gigantic stature and his Numidian mare for the purpose, defeats Picrochole in a great battle in which Captain Tripet gives up four potfuls of soup and his soul amidst the pottage The words are our author's A buffoon could be pardoned for talking that way A philosopher who expressed himself with the same liberty about the immortal soul would have been roasted alive.

It was to the advantage of Rabelais to pretend to be mad and he never forgot it. But let us continue. When combing his hair, after the battle, Gargantua caused the cannon balls to fall out which the enemy had lodged there, and at one of his meals he swallowed six pilgrims with his salad.

The good king Grandgousier distinguished himself in this war even more by his humanity than by his victories

Picrochole fled in despair to the Island of Bouchart Alone, and without a mount, he tried to take an ass from a mill But the millers prevented him from doing so They beat him black and blue, and having stripped him, they threw over him a wretched old canvas jacket Thus the poor choleric wretch went off, and passing the waters near Langeais, he related his misfortunes to an old gypsy, who predicted that his kingdom would be returned to him at the coming of the Cocklicranes "What is become of him," says our author, "we cannot certainly tell, yet was I told that he is now a porter at Lyons, as testie and pettish in humour as he ever was before, and would be always with great lamentation inquiring at all strangers of the coming of the Cocklicranes, expecting assuredly, according to the old woman's prophecie, that at their coming he shall be re-established in his Kingdom."

Such was the end of the Picrocholnal War Observe that this quarrel between kings, this formidable struggle, in which fabulous giants are engaged, illustrious captains, and a monk of such unheard of valour that he alone is worth a whole army, all takes place in a flowery corner of Chinonais, in the little corner where Rabelais spent his childhood. If the field of battle is the author's cradle, should the heroes of the war not come from the same place? There can be no doubt that they do. The wicked Picrochole and the good Gargantua are two countrymen of Friar François. The Gargantuan and Picrocholinal War represents the rivalry of two famous houses in Chinon. This Pyrrhus of Touraine, this insatiable king, this choleric Picrochole, is a doctor in Chinon whose real name was Gaucher-de-Sainte-Marthe. His son, Charles, was later to belong to the Queen of Navarre, a good and wise man, who would, however, never pardon Rabelais for Picrochole, and this gigantic and debonair king, the good man Grandgousier, who warms himself after supper at a fine, big, clear fire where chestnuts are roasting, who writes by the hearth with a stick burnt at one end, with which the fire is stirred, and who tells his wife and all his family the beautiful stories of old times, is none other, we may be sure, than the father of our author, Antoine Rabelais, licentiate of laws, and lawyer in Chinon. At first François merely thought of relating amusingly the dispute of Gaucher and his own father, and this quarrel amongst neighbours, this affair of the stolen cakes, became a burlesque epic, as long as the Iliad. It is the gift of Rabelais to render immense everything that he touches. They say that, in order to make fun of a Hidalgo against whom he had a grievance, Miguel Cervantes began to write his Don Quixote, which was destined to contain so many joyful specimens of humanity Thus this first book is a comic poem like Le Lutrin, in which unimportant facts and unimportant people are comically elevated to an epic grandeur And why not ? What is great, what is small in this world ? All depends upon the feelings of the observer and the tone of the speaker. Some commentators may have said that Rabelais wrote the comic history of his time in this first book, that Picrochole is Charles V, Gargantua François I, and the mare of Gargantua—no offence meant—the Duchesse d'Etampes. There is not a word of truth in that. It is nonsense It is the misfortune of great writers to inspire all sorts of absurdities in swarms of commentators. In the Picrocholinal War Rabelais related his memories of childhood. He always drew from nature It is for that reason that his pictures are so true and of such vivid interest

Friar John, as we have said, is a young monk whom Rabelais knew at Seullé in his childhood In the chronicle, this Friar John greatly aided Grandgousier in the defence of his territories As a reward, the good King founded and endowed an Abbey which was not called after any Saint in the calendar, but was called the Abbey of Thélème, because every one there did what he pleased

This foundation provides Rabelais with an opportunity of showing his taste for art and his knowledge of architecture Unlike the humanists of his time, most of whom were little concerned about the beauty of form and the charm of colour, he lived as much by his eyes as by his mind, and his attention was particularly captivated by the art of building, which had been restored by the Italian Renaissance, deriving its inspiration from Vitruvius and the ruins of antiquity. He appears greatly to have admired the Roman amphitheatre at Saintes. However, his Abbey of Thélème preserves a rather Gothic appearance, with the six turrets at each angle. It is so minutely described in its structural proportions that an attempt has been made to draw a plan of it. This has been attempted twice, first, about 1840 by François Lenormant, then, more recently, by M. Arthur Heulhard. These two archaeologists have drawn plans, both vertical and horizontal, which are by no means identical, but which show a considerable resemblance to each other. This proves that Rabelais is an accurate and exact writer, who describes objects perfectly. Reading him, we can form a very good idea of the Abbey of Thélème. It is a beautiful building in the style of the first French Renaissance. On a fountain in the middle of the courtyard the three Graces can be seen. Over the entrance stood the words Do What Thou Wilt. In this Abbey of his dreams Friar François, whose mind revolted against all constraint, adopted the reverse of the usual regulations of monastic life, and ordered everything in a way contrary to what he had observed and experienced at Fontenay. Women are admitted to Thélème in the company of men. They are free, gallant and wealthy. These were the three essential points. The two first are dependent upon the humour of the Thélémites. The third is guaranteed solely by the munificence of Grandgousier. This prince endowed the Abbey liberally enough to enable the Thélémites to spend their time in liberal studies, in the practice of the arts, in merry talk and pleasant intercourse. Rabelais does not trouble to tell us to what sum this wealth amounted, nor how it was administered. Nowadays people would expect more details in this connection, if one were to offer a plan for a phalanstery.

It will not be amiss to point out that this monk, who has been described as a drunkard and a glutton, forgot the kitchens, when drawing up the detailed plan of his Abbey.

THE SECOND BOOK

THE SECOND BOOK

THE Second Book, which was the first to be written, it is believed, begins with the genealogy and birth of Pantagruel, son of Gargantua and Badebec. Badebec did not survive the birth of her son. That is why the good man Gargantua laughed like a calf and cried like a cow over this birth and this death. The expression, which is our author's, must be excused. It is by no means the worst of the improprieties which he allowed himself.

When the time came to study, Pantagruel went to Poitiers, where he learned a great deal. One day he took from a ledge of rocks a great stone about twelve fathom square and set it upon four pillars in the middle of a field : “ To no other end,” said Rabelais, “ but that the scholars, when they had nothing else to do, might passe their time in getting up on that stone, and feast with a store of gammons, pasties and flaggons, and carve their names upon it with a knife ”

Here we are in the midst of popular tradition The peasants attributed to the caprices of giants the moving of these rough stones, which have since been called Druidic, Celtic, Prehistoric, although no better proven origin has been found for them than that attributed by Rabelais to the raised stone of Poitiers, by hearsay, where the students used to go to eat and drink in his day. For the moment, Pantagruel is a giant, capable, like his father, of swallowing three pilgrims in his salad But wait ! Soon he will become a man of reasonable stature like ourselves Would to the gods that we were all as wise as he ! For, on all occasions, Pantagruel will prove himself reason and kindness personified.

One day, after supper, when he was walking near the gates of Orléans with some of his fellow-students, he met a scholar who was coming along the road from Paris, and as soon as they had saluted each other, he asked .

“ My friend, from whence comest thou now ? ”

The scholar answered .

“ From the alme, inclyte and celebrate Academie, which is vocitated Lutetia ”

To another question of Pantagruel’s, the scholar replied

“ We transfretate the Sequan at the dilucul and crepuscul , we deambulate by the compites and quadrives by the Urb ”

Still talking in this Latinised fashion, he described in these terms the problems of France, where he was born

"The primeval origin of my axes and ataves was indigenare of the Lemovick regions"

"I understand thee very well," said Pantagruel, "when all comes to all, thou art a Limousin, and thou wilt here by thy affected speech counterfeit the Parisiens"

With this the good giant took him by the throat and almost strangled him

This episode of the Limousin student is celebrated Chancellor Pasquier refers to it in his Recherches sur la France.

"We should make use of Greek and Latin, but not to butcher them stupidly as in our youth Helisenne did, of whom our gentle Rabelais rightly made fun in the person of the Limousin scholar"

It is possible, as Pasquier says, that Rabelais made fun of a certain Helisenne, and it is possible that it was a good joke, but it did not cost him any great effort. This conversation of the Limousin scholar may be found in a book which the printer Geoffroy Tory published at least four years before the second book of Pantagruel. It was probably a traditional joke amongst the students of the University of Paris. But we have been warned. Rabelais, like Molière, borrowed on all sides. Great inventors are great borrowers. It would seem as if one could not grow without stealing. I may add that, in taking these "Latial verbocinations" from the printer Geoffroy Tory, Rabelais provided a stick with which to beat himself, for we shall sometimes see him Latinising as the young Limousin did. And the latter had at least an excuse he was a Limousin , he knew only his dialect and the Latin of the Schools How could he have spoken French ?

While at Orléans, Pantagruel was asked by the inhabitants to place in the steeple an enormous bell which they could not move It was child's play for the young giant to go through the streets shaking this bell as if it had been an handbell The delighted inhabitants smiled at the kindness of the young prince But they were glum the next day when they discovered that this bell ringing had spoiled all their wine Now, at that time, the wine of the slopes of Saint-Jean-le-Blanc was regarded as a divine elixir It may be noted in this connection that Rabelais hated bells He could never pardon them for having governed his life and disturbed his Greek studies at Fontenay Undoubtedly many churchmen then shared his aversion The philosophers of the eighteenth century were no better pleased by the great chimes of the cathedrals. André Chénier, a confessed atheist, begged in beautiful verses that the funereal bronze should not moan over his coffin His wish was granted The Romantics, I believe, were the first to discover poetry in these aerial verses of towers and spires Chateaubriand celebrated the poetry of bells. He would have loved them less if they had made him, like Rabelais, get up in the middle of the night

Scarcely had Pantagruel arrived in Paris than he visited the Library of St. Victor There he saw the books of which our author gives the imaginary and ridiculous titles Great efforts have been made to identify them with real works, but not always successfully It appears that Rabelais was chiefly mocking the Scholastics He was a humanist , humanism had either to kill Scholasticism or be killed by it However, we must be careful not to praise François for all sorts of fine intentions which he never had He himself made fun in advance of commentators who might try to credit him with too much wit It is true that he also said it was necessary to break the bone in order to find the marrow What a number of doubtful problems ! If we had to probe them all to the bottom, we should never have finished, and time presses As in the poem of Dante, a voice exhorts us “ Look and pass on ”

While in Paris, Pantagruel received from Gargantua, his father, a very beautiful letter, which has the distinction of showing us the progress of studies in France under François I, and of drawing a vivid portrait of parents and children at this ardent hour when the human mind was reborn

“ Although my deceased father of happy memory, Grandgousier, had bent his best endeavours to make me profit in all perfection and political knowledge, and that my labour and study was fully correspondent to, yea, went beyond his desire nevertheless, as thou mayest well understand, the time then was not so proper and fit for learning as it is at present, neither had I plenty of good masters such as thou hast had , for that time was darksome, and savouring a little of the infelicity and calamity of the Gothes, who had destroyed all good literature, which in my age hath by the divine goodnesse been restored unto its former light and dignity, and that with such amendment and increase of the knowledge, that now hardly should I be admitted unto the first forme of the little grammar school-boys . I say, I, who in my youthful days was (and that justly) reputed the most learned of that age

“ Now is it that the mindes of men are qualified with all manner of discipline, that the learned languages are to their pristine purity restored, viz. Greek (without which a man may be ashamed to account himself a scholar), Hebrew, Arabick, Chaldæan, and Latine Printing likewise is now in use, so elegant, and so correct, although it was found out but in my time by divine inspiration as by a diabolical suggestion on the other side was the invention of ordnance All the world is full of knowing men, of most learned schoolmasters, and vast libraries , and it appears to me as a truth, that neither in Plato’s time, nor Cicero’s, nor Papinian’s, there was ever such conveniency for studying, as we see at this day there is : nor must any adventurer henceforward come in publick, or present himself in company, that hath not been pretty well polished in the shop of Minerva I see robbers, hangmen, freebooters, ostlers, more learned now than the doctors and preachers were in my time

“ What shall I say ? The very women and children have aspired to this praise and celestial manna of good learning

“ Wherefore (my sonne) I admonish thee, to imploy thy youth to profit as well as thou canst both in thy studies and in vertue Thou art at Paris, where the laudable examples of many brave men may stirre up thy minde to gallant action, and hast likewise for thy tutor and pedagogue the learned Epistemon, who by his lively and vocal documents may instruct thee in the arts and sciences

“ I intend, and will have it so, that thou learn the languages perfectly . first of all, the Greek, as Quintillian will have it secondly, the Latine and then the Hebrew, for the holy Scripture-sake : and then the Chaldee and Arabick likewise, and that thou frame thy stile in Greek in imitation of Plato, and, for the Latine, after Cicero. Let there be no history which thou shalt not have ready in thy memory , unto the prosecuting of which designe, books of cosmographie will help thee much Of the liberal arts of geometry, arithmetick, and musick, I gave thee some taste when thou were yet little, and not above five or six yeares old , proceed further in them, and learn the remainder if thou canst As for astronomy, study all the rules thereof, let passe nevertheless the divining and judicial astrology and the art of Lullius as being nothing else but plain abuses and vanities As for the civil law, of that I would have thee to know the texts by heart, and then to conferre them with philosophie

“ Now in the matter of the knowledge of the works of nature, I would have thee study that exactly, and that so there be no sea, river nor fountain, of which thou doest not know the fishes, all the fowles of the aire, all the several kindes of shrubs and trees, whether in forrests or orchards all the sorts of herbes and flowers that grow upon the ground all the various mettals that are hid within the bowels of the earth , together with all the diversity of precious stones that are to be seen in the Orient and South parts of the world , let nothing of all of these be hidden from thee

“ Then faile not most carefully to peruse the books of the Greek, Arabian and Latine physicians, not despising the Talmudists and Cabalists ; and by frequent anatomies get thee the perfect knowledge of the other world, which is Man , and at some houres of the day apply thy minde to the study of the holy Scriptures . first in Greek, the New Testament, with the Epistles of the Apostles ; and then the Old Testament in Hebrew. In brief, let me see thee an abyss and bottomless pit of knowledge . for from hence forward, as thou growest great and becomest a man, thou must part from this tranquillity and rest of study Thou must learn chivalrie, warfare, and the exercises of the field, the better thereby to defend my house and our friends, and to succour and protect them at all their needs against the invasion and assaults of evil doers.

“ Furthermore, I will that very shortly thou try how much thou hast profited, which thou canst not better do than by maintaining publickly theses and conclusions in all arts, against all persons whatsoever, and by haunting the company of learned men, both at Paris and elsewhere.

“ But because, as the wise man Solomon saith, Wisdome entereth not into a malicious minde , and that knowledge without conscience is but the ruine of the soule, it behooveth thee to serve, to love, to feare God, and on Him to cast all thy thoughts and all thy hope, and by faith formed in charity to cleave unto Him so that thee mayest never be separated from Him by thy sins

“ Suspect the abuses of the world set not thy heart upon vanity , for this life is transitory, but the Word of the Lord endureth for ever. Be serviceable to all thy neighbours and love them as thyself reverence thy præceptors shun the conversation of those whom thou desirest not to resemble, and receive not in vaine the graces which God hast bestowed upon thee and when thou shalt see that thou has attained to all the knowledge that is to be acquired in that part, return unto me, that I may see thee, and give thee my blessing before I die Gargantua ”

Now we encounter an interesting person to know, because he is a summary of humanity He has great needs, he is ingenious, naturally perverse, sociable, and his soul is restless His name is Panurge Pantagruel met him by chance on the Charenton Bridge in tatters and rags and half dead with hunger Panurge begged alms of him in Arabian, Italian, English, Basque, Low Breton, in Old Dutch, Spanish, Danish, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Low German, before asking in French In this might be seen a reference to the stupidity of clever people who try to complicate everything More probably our good Rabelais is just amusing himself and it is a conceit of no consequence It must be confessed that he amuses himself somewhat carelessly, since he shows us the studious and learned Pantagruel unable to understand Panurge's Latin, which is quite good But every language, known and unknown, had to pass before his French mother tongue, which Panurge speaks excellently, for he was brought up in his youth in the garden of France, that means Touraine !

The manners of Panurge are far from displeasing to Pantagruel, who is seized with a sudden friendship for the stranger and says to him a little prematurely .

“By my faith, I have already stamped in my minde such a deep impression of love towards you, that, if you will condescend unto my will, you shall not depart out of my company and you and I shall make up another couple of friends, such as Æneas and Achates were.”

One day Pantagruel, who was fortunately not too tall to enter a doorway (we know that Rabelais increases and diminishes his stature at will), announced that he was ready to sustain an argument with all comers. Challenges of this kind were frequent amongst scholars. Pico della Mirandola, at the age of twenty-three, carried on disputations de omni re scibili. Equally young and no less learned, Pantagruel set up nine thousand, seven hundred and sixty-four conclusions which he was ready to defend. For six weeks he argued every day at the Sorbonne, from four in the morning until six in the evening, and acquired great renown. At that moment, the Parliament had to try a case which was so difficult and so involved that nothing could be made of it. In its extreme plight, the court decided to consult the learned Sorbonnist.

“Make the two gentlemen come personally before me,” said Pantagruel.

They appeared and the arbiter allowed the plaintiff to speak, who began as follows:

“My Lord, it is true, that a good woman of my house carried eggs to the market to sell.” “Be covered,” said Pantagruel.

“Thanks to you, my Lord,” said the plaintiff. And he continued:

“But to the purpose. There passed betwixt the two tropicks the summe of threepence towards the zenith and a halfpeny, forasmuch as the Riphæan Mountaines had been that yeare opprest with a great sterility of counterfeit gudgions, etc , etc ”

The few words I have quoted show that the case was obscure

The plaintiff talked for a long time without throwing any more light on it.

The defendant was more vehement but he was not any clearer :

“ Should I endure,” he shouted indignantly, “ that, when I am eating my pottage, and that without either thinking or speaking any manner of ill, they rudely come to vexe, trouble, and perplex my braines with that antick proverb which saith,

“ Who in his pottage-eating drinks will not,
When he is dead and buried, see one jot ”

It was most decidedly an arduous case. In spite of the difficulties which it presented, Pantagruel gave judgment in a sovereign manner and rendered a memorable decision, of which this is the gist

“ Having seen, heard, calculated and well considered of the difference between the two lords here present, the court saith unto them, that in regard of the sudden quaking, shivering and hoarinesse of the flittermouse, bravely declining from the estival soltice, to attempt by private means the surprisal of toyish trifles, etc ”

The decision was as obscure as the case. Doubtless it was for that reason that it seemed equitable to both parties, who withdrew, pleased and satisfied. From that time, Pantagruel was rightly reputed to be as just as Solomon. But let us return to Panurge.

When Pantagruel met him on the Charenton Bridge, Panurge was on his way back from Turkey, where the infidels had broached him on a spit all larded like a rabbit. At least, that is what he said. And he further swore that he had been miraculously saved by the powerful intervention of the good Saint Lawrence, not without assisting the miracle, as is only right, by his own efforts. With a firebrand, which he held in his teeth, he set fire to the house of the Pacha who was cooking him and who, in his peril, invoked all the devils, calling them by their names, Gringoth, Astaroth, Roppalus, and Gribouillis. This was very terrifying to Panurge on his spit, for he was larded, and the devils are quick to carry off people who smell of fat, at least on all Fridays during the year, and during the forty days of Lent, unless they have a special dispensation.

Panurge related many other Turkish tales. The sixteenth century was less polite than the seventeenth. The Turkish tales of Rabelais are more ferocious clowning than those of Molière. Now that there is a Parliament in Constantinople, all those Turks of the old comedies have been relegated to the museum of dreams. And how dead those dreams are, labelled in their glass cases!

At the age of thirty-five Panurge was of medium height, neither too tall nor too small, he had a rather aquiline nose, made like the handle of a razor, a very gallant and proper man in his person, but naturally subject to a kind of disease which at that time was called "lack of money" It is an incomparable grief. Notwithstanding, he had threescore and three tricks to come by it at his need, of which the most honourable and most ordinary was a manner of thieving, secret purloining and filching ; for he was a wicked rogue, a drinker, a royster, a rover, and a very dissolute fellow, if there were any in Paris. Otherwise the best man in the world In short, a man like the rest of us

He was always contriving some plot against the sergeants and the watch. If he saw a man and a woman sitting side by side in church he sewed them together One day he sewed a priest's chasuble to his shirt, in such a way that after Mass the priest removed both together, to the great scandal of those present

At that time there stood in the churches great copper founts with round plaits, or with figures, representing Adam and Eve and the Marriage Feast at Cana, which are now well known to collectors of antiquities The faithful who bought indulgences under the Pontificate of Leo X (then, as we know, Rome sold a great many) placed their offering in the fount When he was short of money, Panurge bought indulgences It was pure profit for him because, while he put a small coin into the plate, he withdrew a larger one.

"You damn yourself like a snake," said Rabelais to him (for it is Rabelais who intervenes in person in this matter of indulgences) , "you are a thief and a sacrilegious person."

Panurge, quoting the holy Scriptures "You shall receive an hundredfold what you give," prided himself, on the contrary, upon conforming to the Gospel In this industry he had not the merit of invention, for we read in one of the colloquies of Erasmus : “ There are those so devoted to the Virgin that, while pretending to put in an offering, they skilfully subtract what another has placed there.”

Like Pantagruel, Panurge argued at the Sorbonne He argued with an English doctor ; the argument was peculiar in this respect, that it took place in silence, by signs It was Panurge who was victorious This victory gave him a reputation in the city of Paris ; he was publicly praised , he was made welcome in all company ; he became presumptuous and fell in love with a great lady of the city He went to see her at her house and engaged with her in a conversation which cannot really be reported. Fortunately, it is not necessary ; suffice it to say that in love the speech of Panurge went straight to the point, and was pressing and urgent The lady became angry ; she would have preferred a little more delicacy.

“ Wicked villain,” she replied, “ is it for you to speak such words to me ? To whom do you think you are talking ? Go ! never let me see you again.”

As he did not stop, she threatened to call her neighbours and have him beaten

“ Ha (said he), you are not so bad as you say, or else I am deceived in your physiognomie, for sooner shall the earth mount up to the heaven, and the highest heavens descend unto the hells, and all the course of nature be quite perverted, than that in so great beauty and neatness as in you is, there should be one drop of gall or malice Your beauty is so excellent, so singular, and so heavenly, that I believe nature hath given it to you as a paragon, to make us know what she can do, when she will imploy all her skill There is nothing in you but honey, but sugar, but a sweet and celestial manna to you it was, to whom Paris ought to have adjudged the Golden Apple, not to Venus, nor to Juno, nor to Minerva ; for never was there so much magnificence in Juno, so much wisdom in Minerva, nor so much comeliness in Venus as there is in you O heavenly gods and goddesses ! how happy shall that man be to whom you will grant that favour ”

As Panurge returned to the point with his customary exactness, the lady went to the window to call the neighbours.

“ I will call them myself,” said Panurge

He went away without much caring for the repulse which he had received

The next day at church, he approached the lady, took her beads, and caused her dress to be ruined by dogs An unworthy revenge Such are the love affairs of Panurge , they are not at all decent

Meanwhile, Pantagruel was informed that Gargantua, his father, having been transported to the land of the fairies, his kingdom of Utopia was invaded by the Dipsodes who, under the leadership of their King, Anarchus, were besieging the capital The young prince at once set out for the land of the Dipsodes, which is a long distance from Chinon, for it is in South Africa Rabelais springs these surprises , but a wise man should be surprised at nothing

Rabelais, as is well known, took the name of Utopia from Thomas More, who had imagined an island of that name and made it the seat of a better social order than the one in which he lived. In the Utopia of Thomas More, socialism reigns, collectivism is put into practice. Goods are held in common, goods but not women ; each man jealously keeps his own. There is no love outside marriage, and adultery is punished by death. Such is the dream of Paradise of a councillor of King Henry VIII. It is true that, in order to avoid as much as possible unhappy unions, Sir Thomas More authorises betrothed couples to see each other without concealment, under the supervision of a matron and a patriarch . But we are not here concerned with studying Utopian civilisation, since Rabelais took from More the name of his island without taking its customs, and there is nothing in common between the English and the French Utopia, the latter being merely a sham. O ! how little we shall study social questions there !

Once landed in Utopia, Pantagruel, calling together his companions, Panurge, Epistémon, Eusthenes and Carpalin, said to them with his accustomed wisdom .

“ Let us advise well what is to be done, that we be not like the Athenians who never took counsel until after the fact.”

Pantagruel, having become a swaggering giant once more in Utopia, encountered there an adversary of his own stature, Captain Loupgarou, whose mace weighed nine thousand, seven hundred quintals and two quarterons, at the end of which were thirteen pointed diamonds, the least of which was as big as the largest bell of Nôtre Dame in Paris Before measuring himself against Loupgarou, the son of Gargantua recommended himself to God, and promised him that if he emerged from the adventure with honour he would cause to be preached in his Kingdom the holy Gospel, purely, simply and entirely, and to exterminate the abuses sewn by the hypocrites. Usually giants are pagans, this one is a Christian He calls himself a Catholic, but he is in favour of the Reformation, and we should like to know whom he calls hypocrites. I am afraid they are good Catholics submissive to the authority of the Pope. Loupgarou and his giants were defeated and exterminated But Pantagruel suffered a cruel loss : in the battle the faithful Epistémon lost his head Contrary to appearances, the evil was not without a remedy Panurge, whom we had not suspected of being a surgeon, anointed the head and body with a certain ointment, adjusted the one to the other, vein against vein, sinew against sinew, vertebræ against vertebræ, gave it fifteen or sixteen stitches with a needle, and put all round it a little resuscitative ointment Suddenly Epistémon began to breathe, then opened his eyes, then yawned, then sneezed.

Somewhat hoarse, Epistémon began to speak He had seen the devils, he said, and had talked familiarly with Lucifer He declared that the devils were good companions and complained that Panurge had called him back to life so soon.

“ I took a wonderful delight,” said he, “ in seeing the damned in hell ”

“ How so ? ” said Pantagruel

“ They do not use them there (said Epistémon), so badly as you think they do : their estate and condition of living is but only changed after a very strange manner ; for I saw Alexander the Great there, amending and patching on clowts upon old breeches and stockins, whereby he got but a very poor living. Xerxes was a crier of mustard , Romulus a salter."

In this manner our author gives some mechanical or manual trade to the heroes of antiquity, the knights of Brittany and France and to all the princes of Europe. Pope Julius, Papa Giulio, who, in his lifetime, had ordered Michaelangelo to represent him, sword in hand, is a crier of pudding pies in hell. He no longer wears his great beard. Cleopatra sells onions and Livia cleans vegetables. Piso is a peasant, Cyrus a cowherd, Brutus and Cassius land-surveyors, Demosthenes a vine-dresser, Fabius a threader of beads, Artaxerxes a rope-maker, Æneas a miller, Achilles a scurvy pate, Agamemnon a lick-pot, Ulysses a hay-mower, Nestor a beggar, Ancus Martius a ship-trimmer . . . The list stretches out longer than a breadless day Most of the time, unfortunately, not the slightest connection can be seen between the person and his condition ; whenever, by chance, the connection is seen, it is much worse, because then it is apparent that they are simply incongruous puns and absurd clashes of syllables Our François, who, alone and unaided, thinks more and better than his entire century, freely exercises the divine gift of thinking of nothing, whenever the humour seizes him It seizes him suddenly like a blessing, then he tells his beads of words What a blessed author ! And that is and always will be well !

"I saw," continued Epistémon, "Epictetus there most gallantly apparalled after the French fashion, sitting under a pleasant arbour, with store of handsome gentlewomen, frolicking, drinking, dancing, and making good chieare, with abundance of crowns of the sunne

When he saw me, he invited me to drink with him very courteously, and I being willing to be entreated, we tiple and chopined together most theologically. I heard Master Frances Villon ask Xerxes, how much the messe of mustard ? ‘ A farthing,’ said Xerxes ” Whereupon Villon called him a rascal and harshly reproached him with overcharging for food

The Middle Ages have left several narratives of journeys into the other world, not to mention the Divine Comedy of Dante Rabelais must certainly have known some of them, but he took nothing from any of these Christian stories He borrowed the principal traits and even the spirit of his little Nékyia from an ancient writer, his favourite author. The Nekyomanteia of Lucian was his only model It was there that he found those changes in human condition which astonished and pleased Epistémon In this dialogue, the philosopher Menippus, questioned by Philonides, tells him of the excursion which he has just made amongst the dead

PHILONIDES

Tell me, Menippus, are not those who have on earth lofty and magnificent tombs, columns, statues and inscriptions more highly considered in Hades than the common dead ?

MENIPPUS

You cannot be serious, my friend If you had seen Mausoleus himself, that Carian celebrated for his tomb, I am certain you would have laughed loud and long, on seeing him lying shamefully in a corner, lost in the crowd . . . But you would have laughed even more, I am sure, on seeing kings, satraps, reduced to the state of beggars, compelled by poverty to become vendors of salted meat, or schoolmasters, exposed to the insults of the passer-by, and beaten like the vilest slaves I could not restrain myself when I saw Philip of Macedonia in a corner mending old shoes for money Others could be seen begging for alms at the cross-roads, Xerxes, Darius, Polycrates

PHILONIDES

What you tell me about the kings is amazing and almost incredible But what were Socrates, Diogenes, and the other sages doing ?

MENIPPUS

Socrates was walking about there also, arguing with everyone Near him were Palamedes, Ulysses, Nestor and all the dead who love talking The legs of Socrates were still swollen as a result of the poison he took As for good Diogenes, he is the neighbour of Sardanapalus, the Assyrian, of Midas, the Phrygian, and other wealthy men When he hears them groaning at the memory of their lost riches, he laughs and is in a good humour. Usually he lies on his back and sings so loudly, in a hoarse and savage tone, that he drowns the complaints of those unhappy men it is a great sorrow for them, and they have resolved to go and live far from the intolerable company of Diogenes

What a difference, what a contrast, between the original and the copy ! Rabelais does not limit himself, does not stop He is amused. He plays with words as children play with stones , he piles them up. To him is given wealth, abundance, childish and sonorous merriment, that immense strength which is unaware of itself A refined elegance, measure and order belong to his model ;

it is rapid, sober, economical It seems dry when translation deprives it of the harmony of its native language But we can feel that it is as polished as a finger-nail If it were otherwise, the Greeks would not be the Greeks.

It is one of the most unexpected, the most paradoxical, and yet the strongest and most certain proofs of the genius of Rabelais that, having known, read, and imitated Lucian so much, he always remained so far removed from his favourite model He borrowed on all sides, as was the custom of his time But unconsciously he transformed everything he touched

King Anarchus, in this second book, meets with almost the same fate as King Picrochole in the first book Having made the unfortunate Anarchus prisoner, Panurge marries him to an old lantern-carrying hag. Pantagruel gave them a little lodge near the lower street and a mortar of stone wherein to bray and pound their sauce Anarchus became as pretty a crier of green sauce as ever was seen in Utopia After the capture of Anarchus, the only people of Utopia who still resisted were the Amaurots At the head of his army, Pantagruel went to conquer them A storm overtook them on the plains and the rain fell in a downpour Pantagruel put out his tongue halfway and covered his army "Meanwhile," says Rabelais, "I, who relate you these so veritable stories, hid myself under a burdock-leaf, but when I saw them thus covered, I went towards them to shelter myself likewise, which I could not do, for that they were so (as the saying is) 'at the yard's end there is no cloth left' Then as well as I could, I got upon it, and went along full two leagues, upon his tongue, before I came into his mouth But, O gods and goddesses, what did I see there ? I saw there great rocks, I believe that those were his teeth I saw also faire meadows, large forrests, great and strong cities, not a jot lesse then Lyons or Poictiers The first man I met with there, was a good honest fellow planting coleworts, whereat being very much amazed, I asked him : ‘ My friend, what dost thou make here ? ’ ‘ I plant coleworts ’ ”

That is more Lucian Long before Friar François explored the mouth of the giant, Lucian had discovered a world in the belly of a whale He relates that travellers, swallowed by the monster, met in his inside an old man and a young one, cultivating a garden “ The old man,” says the Greek author, “ takes us by the hand and leads us to his dwelling, which he had made very comfortable. There he serves us with vegetables, fruits, fish and wine ”

This second book is perhaps inferior to the first, whose main themes it repeats, but it is still excellent in places. It ends with the cleaning out of Pantagruel’s stomach Only doctors can judge the technical merits of this. In my opinion the passage is far from pleasant. Is this a reproach against Rabelais ? Why, certainly not ! This Pantagruel is a whole world, a world with its lands, its oceans, its plants, its animals. It is as right that we should find there dirt and manure as flowers and fruits.

CHAPTER IV

THE Gargantua and the Pantagruel, printed in the shape of popular little booklets, with crude wood engravings, were very popular and had many readers, for they had several editions in a short space of time. But the theologians were exceedingly wroth. They were very much excited at this time. The King's own sister, the good Queen of Navarre, was, in this year 1533, denounced, insulted, threatened with the gallows and the stake, and ignominiously represented on the stage of the College of Navarre. A book written by her, an austere, edifying, ascetic work, Le Miroir de l'âme pécheresse, caused a scandal. It was not enough to be pious, it was necessary to be pious in the Sorbonne manner. Pantagruel was condemned at the Sorbonne, together with a book which I have never, I confess, read, La Sylve d'Amours. For a long time, things had not been so bad in France. Numerous heretics were being burned in Paris and Rouen, but the common people did not think that enough were being burned. The winds of anger and cruelty were blowing up from below, rising from the mob which applauded the tortures and eagerly breathed the odour of roasting flesh. The King was not wicked, he was no fanatic, he was a frivolous man, completely given up to gallantry and sport, who liked art and letters and was as favourable to scholars and artists as his frivolity and selfishness permitted him. He was undecided, powerless before this flood of popular and monastic fury. But, if only from self-interest and in order to defend his independence against the enterprises of the Pope, he was inclined towards a wise, moderate and royalist reformation of the Church of France. Suddenly, in the month of October, 1534, an audacious gesture on the part of the Reformers, a piece of insolent bravado on the part of those known as Sacramentarians, drove him on to the side of the hangmen.

On the 18th of that month, in Paris and several other cities, and even in the King's own chamber, placards were found which were violently hostile to the Mass François I was irritated and frightened by this. From that moment he gave the theologians a free hand ; everywhere the stakes were lighted. At one moment he even thought of forbidding the printing of books. It was very dangerous to write about matters of faith and, at that time, everything was a matter of faith, or was connected therewith. However, we need not believe that the author of the censored Pantagruel was in very grave danger of being burned. On the contrary, amongst the suspects he was one of those least threatened. Like Brutus in the Rome of Tarquinius, François Rabelais played the fool in his books and was thus enabled to say what no man reputed to be in his senses could have said with impunity His Gargantua and his Pantagruel were regarded, it is true, as detestable buffoonery, but of no consequence, which were censored only in the interests of decency and good manners Further, Master François was physician to the Bishop of Paris It will be remembered that the young monk of La Baumette had made the acquaintance of two very great and very powerful personages, the brothers Guillaume and Jean du Bellay, of a very illustrious Anjou family Now, in 1534, Rabelais was in the service of Jean du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, whom the King was sending that year on an embassy to Rome

At this point it is necessary to say a few words about this prelate whose protection was so valuable to our author Jean du Bellay, while quite young, had astonished the University of Paris by the extent of his learning, sacred and profane Trained in the exercise of dialectic and in public debate, he had held his own against the most obstinate theologians That is how the finest minds of the Church liked to employ themselves They had posted up at every cross-road in the city the theses which they wished to maintain, like those which we recently saw young Pantagruel post, to the number of nine thousand, seven hundred and sixty-four at one time, in Paris, "touching in them the hardest doubts that are in any science" Subtle, agreeable, persuasive, Jean du Bellay succeeded very well in the negotiations with which the King had entrusted him Having been sent to England, to the court of King Henry VIII, he had won him over and, on his return to France, he had obtained the Bishopric of Paris In 1533 he was present at the interview in Marseilles, where Pope Clement VII and King François I concluded an agreement of which the Reformers in France were to pay the costs Being agreeable, both to the Pope and to Henry VIII, he was obviously designed to negotiate in Rome for the divorce of the King of England He set out with his household Passing through Lyons, he found Friar François Rabelais, whom he had previously known as a novice at La Baumette, and out of his love for Greek, he took him with him as his physician.

Delighted at travelling over the soil of Italy, which had nourished one of the most beautiful civilisations in the world, and where the ancient learning had awakened from its long sleep, Rabelais looked forward to talking to the scholars, studying the topography of Rome ; and looking for plants unknown in France

The Bishop and his suite set out in the month of January, 1534, and, being pressed by the inclement weather and the urgency of their business, they scarcely stopped in the towns along the way. Rabelais explored Rome with two studious companions, Claude Chapuis, librarian to the King and French poet, and Nicolas Leroy, a jurist with Lutheran leanings. There is often an odour of heresy about the people with whom Rabelais associated. He undertook a complete description of the Eternal City, whose smallest vicolo he was beginning to know, but he abandoned this work when he heard that an antiquarian of Milan, called Marliani, had undertaken the task and had just successfully completed it.

Jean du Bellay, however, employed in vain his keen mind and his abundant eloquence. He could not bring the cardinals over to the side of the King of England. He spoke well, and if Rabelais may be believed, he spoke better than Cicero. None the less, the Consistory decided that the marriage of Henry VIII was valid. Thus was provoked the schism which still lasts. Without being personally involved in the negotiations, Rabelais was present at the meeting, when the Pope and the Sacred College discussed this question, so trifling in itself and so important in its consequences. He was keenly interested, for he was as curious about matters of his own time as about Greek, Latin and Hebrew antiquities.

On the 15th of April the Embassy was back at Lyons. In this city Rabelais published an edition of Marliani's topography with a Latin epistle to Bishop Jean du Bellay, in which he eloquently expressed his gratitude to his master and protector.

"You have conferred on me," he said in this Ciceronian epistle, "that which has been the dearest wish of my heart ever since I have had any feeling for the progress of belles lettres, viz., that I might be able to traverse Italy and pay a visit to Rome, the world's capital, and you have brought it about for me, not only to visit Italy, but also to visit it in your company, you who of all men under Heaven are distinguished for learning and courtesy—the value to be set on which I have not yet fully realised. To me indeed it was more to see you at Rome than to have seen Rome itself. To have been at Rome may fall to any one's lot, and lies before all, except those who are maimed and disabled in all their limbs, but to have seen you at Rome successful, with incredible congratulations of every one, was a source of pleasure, to have taken part in affairs at the time when you were conducting that illustrious embassy, on which you had been sent to Rome by our most triumphant King Francis, was a matter for boasting, to have been by your side when you pronounced your speech on the affairs of the King of England, in the most sacred and dignified conclave in the world, was a point of high felicity."

Jean du Bellay returned to Italy in the month of July, 1535. and once again François Rabelais accompanied him. On the 18th they were at Carmagnola, on the 22nd at Ferrara. There the ambassador had recourse to the arts of his physician, he was not well and in no state to travel with post-horses, he said. At Florence, where they stopped, Master François, in the excellent company of scholars, contemplated the beautiful situation of the city, the structure of the cathedral, the sumptuousness of the churches and palaces. As he vied with his companions as to who should most worthily praise all this magnificence, a monk from Amiens, named Bernard Lardon, expressed his surprise and dissatisfaction.

“The devil take me,” said he, “if I know what you find here so worthy of praise. I have gazed as well as you and am no more blind. What is there? Beautiful houses, and nothing more. But, God and our good patron, St. Bernard, be with us! In the whole city I have not yet seen a single cook-shop and I have looked and searched with curiosity. . . In four times, in only three times the distance which we have covered in our observations, I could show you at Amiens more than fourteen old and sweet-smelling cook-shops. I do not know what pleasure you found in looking at the lions and tigers near the belfrey and the porcupines and ostriches of the Strozzi Palace. By my faith, my children, I should like to see a good and plump young goose on the spit. These porphyries, these marvels, beautiful? I say nothing again of them. But the cream cakes of Amiens are better to my taste. These ancient statues are well made, I have no doubt. But let St Ferréol of Abbéville, the young lasses of our country are a thousand times more engaging ”

Need I say that this is Rabelais, word for word The lions and the tigers mentioned by Friar Bernard Lardon are not, as might be imagined, carved in marble They are animals in a princely menagerie The great Italian lords kept wild beasts in their palaces A picture by Giovanni Bellini, preserved in the Louvre, shows a rich Renaissance palace, with wild beasts chained in the cellars Towards the middle of August, Jean du Bellay was in Rome, where he received the Hat Although he was there in grave and difficult circumstances, he found the time to look for antiques In order to make excavations, he purchased a vineyard near San Lorenzo in Palisperna, between Viminal and Esquiline He received from a Roman Cardinal a beautiful old mortar This present to a foreigner caused such a clamour in Rome that du Bellay had to return the mortar to the Governor of the Capital.

At this period, the palaces of the Eternal City were ornamented, as they still are to-day, with ancient fragments, marbles, bronzes, jasper, porphyries The nobles had them placed in the courtyards, in the gardens, on the steps and at the entrances of the rooms It happened that a young Frenchman, who was later to become renowned as a cosmographer, André Thévet, was in Rome during the embassy of Jean du Bellay and went about the city examining the sculpture with passionate ardour One day, when his curiosity had drawn him into the courtyard and gardens of a nobleman, and he was lost in the contemplation of the remains of so great a past, the lackeys, misunderstanding what attracted him into a private dwelling, took him for a spy. They would have given him a bad reception if young Thévet had not declared to the master of the house that he was known to Rabelais. Rabelais introduced his compatriot to this nobleman as a great traveller and collector of antiquities. From that moment Thévet was freely admitted into all the Roman houses. This single fact shows that Cardinal du Bellay's position was in good repute with the Italian nobility.

In the Eternal City Rabelais frequented the priests who had come from the East. The Bishop of Caramith, who gave him some lessons in Arabic, abused the credulity of his pupil, who was not, however, very ingenious, by persuading him that the noise of the cataracts of the Nile is audible at three days' distance, that is, from Paris to Tours.

Rabelais had no regular position in religion. From fear of the hobgoblins, as he called them, or rather, in order to be in a position to profit by all the advantages which he might expect from his illustrious protectors, he addressed to the Pope a supplication pro apostasia. In it he confesses to have deserted the religious life, to have gone abroad through the world, and he asks the Sovereign Pontiff for full and complete absolution, permission to renew the habit of St. Benedict, to re-enter a monastery of that Order, where they are willing to receive him, and to practise everywhere, with the permission of his superior, the art of medicine, in which, he said, he had taken the degrees of bachelor, licentiate and doctor. To practise it within the limits canonically imposed upon priests, that is, up to the application of the knife and fire exclusively, for purely humanitarian reasons and without any hope of lucre

I may point out, without unduly dwelling on the fact, that Rabelais at this time held the degree of licentiate in medicine, and was not yet a fully qualified doctor, although amply equipped with the talent and knowledge requisite

His request was granted by a letter of Pope Paul III Farnese, dated 17th January, 1536, in the second year of his pontificate. The latter is conceived in the most flattering terms for Rabelais

“Wishing to succour with gracious favour one who hath received manifold commendations for zeal in religion, knowledge of letters, honesty of life and morals, and other merits of probity and virtue, having these things in view, do hereby absolve you, etc.”

We must be careful not to see in this document the opinion of the Holy Father concerning the author of Pantagruel. This is the formal style of diplomacy. What must have touched Friar François more than these testimonials to his qualities and virtues was the fact that, contrary to usage, the Pope granted him gratis and without expense the privilege of composing bulls of absolution. The grantee had only to bear the cost of copying, that is to say, as he himself irreverently put it, the honorarium of the “referendary, proctors and other blotters on parchment.”

From Rome Rabelais kept up a correspondence, of which a few letters remain, with the pleasant Bishop of Maillezais, Geoffroy d'Estissac. On the 29th November, 1535, he notified the Bishop that he was sending him some seeds from Naples for the garden of Ligugé, the best seeds which the Holy Father had sown in his private garden at the Belvedere. He also sent him some pimpernel ; if he does not send him salads of nasitord and arrousa, it is because he found them too tough and much less grateful to the stomach than the variety cultivated at Ligugé. It is touching to see Master François thus striving to enrich the gardens which he had enjoyed as a poor monk, and to provide vegetables for the table at which he used to sit when he was exposed to the resentment of the hobgoblins. He furnished advice as to the time of planting these seeds which he sent, and the care to be given to the plants. He offered Alexandria pinks, matronal violets, and also an herb with which the Italians keep their chambers fresh in summer called belvedere. "But," he added, "this would be rather for Madame d'Estissac." He meant young Anne de Daillon, married to Louis d'Estissac, nephew of the Bishop. In return, he asked for some crowns. The ambassador of the king of France was always in need of money. His physician, as may be imagined, was even more so. Rabelais never had any money, it was a disease with him, and he had experienced all the feelings which he attributes to Panuige in this connection. He is always ready to ask of the great, believing that to beg from them is to do them a favour.

One day he wrote to the Bishop of Maillezaïs .

"If I am short of money I shall appeal to your charity."

This he did a few days later. "I am again obliged to have recourse to your alms. For the thirty crowns, which you were pleased to have paid to me here, are all but come to an end."

and yet I have spent nothing for any ill use, nor yet upon eating , for I eat and drink with my Lord Cardinal du Bellay or my Lord de Mascon But in these little trumperies of dispatches and hiring of chamber-furniture and keeping up one's dress, a great deal of money goes , although I regulate myself as frugally as I possibly can If it is your pleasure to send me a bill of exchange, I hope to employ it only in your service and to be grateful besides I see in this city a thousand little knick-knacks to be bought cheap, which are brought from Cyprus, Candia and Constantinople If it seems good to you, I will send you anything that I shall see suitable for you, as well as my Lady d'Estissac The carriage from here to Lyons will cost nothing "

I hasten to say that Master François gave Monsignor d'Estissac plenty for his money I do not speak of the little knick-knacks, which must have been very like the amber beads, the copper trays, the many-hued fabrics and the embroideries of our Oriental bazaars, nor of the seeds, salads and vegetables from Naples The Bishop of Maillezais entrusted him with the most important business which he had at the court of Rome and Rabelais acquitted himself with skill We have this on the authority of Colletet, one of the oldest biographers of our author Finally, he gave his correspondent news of Rome and the whole of Christendom, which was very valuable at a time when it was hardly possible to learn about public affairs save by private letters

Very important events were occurring in Christendom at the time, and Rabelais, although not in a position to disentangle the intrigues which were being concocted in Italy, was fairly well informed of the facts as they occurred So far as the King of France was concerned, he had particular sources of information and, if certain rumours are to be believed, sometimes less discretion than is necessary in matters of this kind Charles V, who had made an expedition into Tunis that year, on his victorious return to Sicily, was preparing for the conquest of France, and making plans after the manner of Picrochole. Knowing that prophecies sometimes bring about the accomplishment of the facts which they predict, his partisans were uttering all sorts of prognostications which conformed to the plans of the Emperor, and a certain book, full of such oracles, was creating a considerable stir in Rome Rabelais, who had the work to his hand, sent a copy to M de Maillezais "For my own part," he added, when sending it, "I put no faith in it. But none hath ever seen Rome so given over to these vanities and divinations as she is at present"

Meanwhile Charles V, who was expected at Rome, remained in Naples, forming alliances, raising troops, and collecting money Rabelais informed the Bishop of Maillezais that the Emperor had postponed his arrival until the end of February, and he added

"If I had as many crowns as the Pope would give days of pardon to whosoever would put it off to five or six years from now, I should be richer than Jacques Cœur ever was"

It is easy to understand the feeling of the Sovereign Pontiff Rome had just been sacked and despoiled of all its riches People feared that, if the Emperor and his troops fell upon it, nothing would remain of the unfortunate city

"They have begun in this city," Rabelais continued, "great preparations to receive him By command of the Pope they have made a new road by which he is to enter To make and level this road they have demolished and thrown down more than two hundred houses and three or four churches, level with the earth This is taken by many as an evil presage ”

Meanwhile the Emperor was approaching and Cardinal du Bellay no longer felt safe in Rome Busybodies advised him to look to his sword and his poison Believing that his life was threatened, and resolved to escape this mortal danger by flight, he caused his doctors to spread the report of a headache which confined him to bed, jumped on his horse and fled alone through Romagna, Bologna, Montecalieri, into France For two days the Cardinal's servants were unaware of his departure. Rabelais, who was doubtless no better informed than the others, rejoined his master in Paris.

At this time Charles V, in his attempt to realise long cherished projects, crossed the Var and entered Provence with fifty thousand men, while the Imperialists entered France by the north, took Guise, besieged Péronne and marched on Paris Cardinal Jean du Bellay, Bishop of this city, having been named the King's lieutenant-general, by a decree of the 21st July, 1536, was trying to put his episcopal city into a state of defence, as Bishop Synesius formerly did in Pentapolis His task was difficult, for the walls of Paris were worthless On this point we have the authority of Pantagruel In the fifteenth chapter of the second book it is said that Panurge, looking at them derisively, spoke of them with contemptuous irony

“ O ! ” cried he, “ how strong they are, and well fitted to keep geese in a mue or coop to fatten them ! By my beard, they are competently scurvie for such a city as this is , for a cow with her tail would overthrow above six fathoms of them ”

“ Oh, my friend (said Pantagruel), dost thou know what Agesilaus said, when he was asked why the great city of Lacedemon was not enclosed with walls ? Lo, here (said he), the walls of the city, in showing them the inhabitants and citizens thereof, so strong, so well armed, and so expert in military discipline , signifying thereby that there is no wall but of bones, and that towns and cities cannot have a surer wall, nor better fortification than the prowess and vertue of the citizens and inhabitants , so is this city so strong, by the great number of war-like people that are in it, that they care not for making any other walls Besides, whosoever would go about to wall it, as Strasboug, Orléans, or Ferrara, would finde it almost impossible, the cost and charges would be so excessive.”

“ Yea, but (said Panurge), it is good neverthesse to have an out-side of stone, when we are invaded by our enemies, were it but to ask, who is below there ? ”

Cardinal du Bellay put into practice the wise maxims of Panurge and tried to give Paris an outside of stone to receive the Imperialists. He fortified the city with ramparts and boulevards and took in provisions

But the peril which they feared disappeared of itself , the imperial army melted away, exhausted by famine and dysentery The siege of Péronne was raised and almost at the same time

RABELAIS

Montmorency obliged Charles V to recross the Var. You may be sure that these events were not indifferent to Rabelais, who had a great love for France and his King, and in whom the feeling of military glory blew in great gusts.

The Bishop of Paris was the Abbot of the Benedictine Abbey of Saint-Maur-des-Fossés. We know that Rabelais had obtained by a letter from the Pope permission to be a monk in a monastery of the Order of St. Benedict where they were willing to receive him. He was received as a monk at St. Maur and lived in this house. But the Abbey of St. Maur, having been raised to the rank of a collegiate church by the Pope, at the request of the Cardinal Abbot, the monks there had the rank of Canons. This seemed to exclude Rabelais, unless there were another letter authorising his Canonicate. To leave St. Maur, according to him, was to leave Paradise, a Paradise, he said, of healthfulness, amenity, serenity, delight, and all honest pleasures of agriculture and rustic life. We do not know what became of this request, and there is little interest in knowing it. Rabelais could not remain in a Paradise, any more than Eve, like her, he was too full of curiosity for that.

We find him again in Paris when the humanist printer, Étienne Dolet, who had been persecuted as a murderer and pardoned by the King, gave a banquet in that city to celebrate the royal clemency, to which he invited a distinguished crowd of scholars, men of letters, and poets, Guillaume Budé, Danès, Toussain, Macrin, Bourbon, Voulte, Clément Marot, the Gallic Virgil, and François Rabelais, who had been invited in his capacity as an excellent physician. Étienne Dolet himself has transmitted to us in Latin verses the names of the guests and the subjects of conversation. They talked sub rosa about the cleverest writers of which foreign countries could boast. Erasmus, Melanchthon, Bembo, Sadolet, Vida, Jacques Sannazar, and each of these names was greeted with loud acclamation. If the ancient Muse of Etienne Dolet has not exaggerated the austerity of the speeches, this banquet was a banquet of sages, and the orgies in which those present indulged were what a Greek poet called the quiet orgies of thought.

Very shortly after this celebration, Rabelais went to Montpellier, where, on the 22nd May, 1537, he was raised to the rank of a doctor, a title which he had already taken before he had obtained it, but not without being worthy of it, for everything points to the belief that he was a very good doctor. As we have seen, he was a botanist and an anatomist, a cook, a scholar, and according to his learned friend, Sussanneau, he had that joyful, serene, gracious, open countenance which cheers the patient, and is a notable part of the art of Hippocrates and Galen.

In 1537, he made another sojourn in Lyons, his favourite city, which was disturbed by a misadventure about which we have very little information. A letter which he sent to some friend in Italy was handed over to Cardinal de Tournon who, whether rightly or wrongly, finding blameworthy indiscretions, sent it to Chancellor du Bourg, with a few lines which indicate his anger towards the physician of Jean du Bellay.

"Sir," he writes, "I am sending you a letter which Rabelais wrote to Rome, from which you will see what news he was communicating to one of the worst rakes in Rome I have given him orders not to leave this city (Lyons) until I learn what are your wishes If he had not spoken of me in the said letter and avowed his fealty to the King and Queen of Navarre, I should have had him thrown into prison, in order to set an example to all these scribblers of news You will write to me what is your pleasure, and I rely upon you to let the King know of this what shall seem best to you ”

Whatever Cardinal de Tournon may say, Rabelais belonged to Cardinal du Bellay, Ambassador of the King, and consequently, to the King himself He was not in the service of the Queen of Navarre , but it is possible that he may have used the name of so helpful a princess, the certain refuge of poor or persecuted humanists One of her servitors said that she was the port and refuge of all who were unhappy We do not know whether the complaints of Cardinal de Tournon were well founded What is certain is that the matter had no unpleasant consequences for Rabelais, whom we find, in 1538, accompanying François I to Aigues-Mortes and being present at those interviews which, by bringing together the Emperor and the King, won the latter over to the Spanish Catholic party, to the great detriment of the humanists, who are all more or less Reformers and inclined towards Lutheranism in the light French manner An exclusive devotion to the cause of Roman orthodoxy animated the conduct of François I and Charles V, when they were reconciled

It is time to reveal a fact which was long unknown but is certain, of his private life. François Rabelais had a child in this city of Lyons by a mother who is unknown to us, a son who received at the baptismal fount the name of Théodule, and one is tempted to believe that it was his father who gave him this name, which means Adorer of God. Rabelais never lost an opportunity of showing his love for Almighty God. He loved Him as a philosopher, for love of Plato and against his priests. Far from hiding this child as a disgrace, François showed him to everybody and little Théodule was rocked in the purple on the knees of cardinals. The princes of the Church could not be severe upon a monk who, after all, did not surrender more than they to the desires of the flesh. Cardinal Jean du Bellay, to mention only one, lived in a sort of conjugal union with the twice widowed sister of that Cardinal de Tournon whom we have recently seen so irritated against Master François. Théodule, upon whom the princes of the Church smiled, died at the age of two. A friend of Rabelais, Boyssonné, a jurist and poet, consecrated to this child, torn so young from life, a whole flora of Latin elegies, distichs, hendecasyllabics, and iambic verses. The following is a translation of these little poems, which imitate in form the Greek Anthology, but are deeply stamped by Christian thought. I have used the translation of M. Arthur Heulhard, slightly modified in places.

OF THÉODULE RABELAIS DEAD AT THE AGE OF TWO YEARS

You ask who lies in this tomb so small? It is little Theodule himself, in truth everything about him is small, age, shape, eyes, mouth, for he is a child in body. But he is great through his father, the learned and

RABELAIS

crudite, versed in all the arts which a good, pious and honest man should know Little Théodule would have learned them all from his father if destiny had allowed him to live, and from the small child that he was he would have one day become a great man

TO THEODULE RABELAIS DYING AT THE AGE OF TWO YEARS

Why leave us so soon, I ask thee, Rabelais ? Why this wish to renounce the joys of living ? Why fall before the day, betraying thy tender youth ? Why prepare to die a premature death ?

REPLY

It is not, Boysson, from hatred of living, that I abandon life If I die it is in order not to die for ever I thought that life with Christ is the only life which should be precious to good souls

DISTICH (TO THE SAME)

By going to Heaven so young, Theodule, thou showest that only those who share your fate are loved by God

ANOTHER

I who was called Théodule, that is, slave of God, I pray that you may be like me in word and deed

ANOTHER

He whom you see reposing in this narrow tomb was the friend, when living, of Roman Pontiffs

ANOTHER

Lyons is his country, Rabelais his father He who is ignorant of both is ignorant of the two greatest things in the world

Fearing lest I become the slave of men and wishing only to obey God, the All-Highest and All-Good, lest I be compelled to descend from horses to asses, I, who had two years here below, leave the mortals and fly to Heaven.

These verses have a flavour of Christian Platonism which may appear affected to us, but which was very much the fashion of the time. Philosophy, like clothing and headdress, is subject to fashion, and there is nothing which better marks a place and an epoch than the idea entertained of the absolute and the infinite. We even represent eternity itself in our own image and to our own taste. The abstract has its picturesque quality, like the concrete. I like to find a literary comparison which illustrates the style of the period and the manner of the author. That is why I shall quote, after the Latin verses of Boyssonné, a little poem, more than 200 years later, on a similar subject, an elegy of André Chénier on the death of a child. As the Latin Muse of the old jurist of Toulouse is stiff and solemn, so the French Muse of the son of Saint L'Hommage is subtle, graceful and pathetic.

SUR LA MORT D'UN ENFANT

L'innocente victime, au terrestre séjour,
N'a vu que le printemps qui lui donna le jour
Rien n'est resté de lui qu'un nom, un vain nuage,
Un souvenir, un songe, une invisible image
Adieu, fragile enfant, échappé de nos bras,
Adieu, dans la maison d'où l'on ne revient pas
Nous ne te verrons plus, quand, de moissons couverte,

RABELAIS

La campagne d'été rend la ville déserte
Dans l'enclos paternel, nous ne te verrons plus,
De tes pieds, de tes mains, de tes flancs demi-nus,
Presser l'herbe et les fleurs dont les nymphes de Seine Couronnent tous les ans les coteaux de Lucienne
L'axe de l'humble char à tes jeux destiné,
Par de fidèles mains avec toi promené,
Ne sillonnera plus les prés et le rivage
Tes regards, ton murmure, obscur et doux langage,
N'inquiéteront plus nos soins officieux
Nous ne recevrons plus, avec des cris joyeux,
Les efforts impuissants de ta bouche vermeille
A bégayer les sons offerts à ton oreille
Adieu, dans la demeure où nous nous suivrons tous,
Où ta mère déjà tourne ses yeux jaloux.

In 1537, the brother of Cardinal du Bellay, Guillaume du Bellay, lord of Langey, in the absence of Marshal d'Annebault, was charged ad interim with the function of the King's lieutenant-general in Piedmont. The King of France had conquered this country without difficulty, the difficulty was to keep it. Langey had to put Turin, which was threatened by the Imperialists, in a state of defence, set up a Parliament in this city, with instructions to apply French law, fill the offices of the judiciary, prepare the fortifications of the castles and towns all over the country, and bring from France oil, groceries, salt fish for Lent, and medicaments, of which Piedmont had been denuded.

Master François was called to Turin in 1540, and discharged there the function of physician to the Viceroy, who was in great need of his services, for Langey, being a little over 50, was greatly worn and the superhuman labour which he undertook completed the ruin of his shattered health.

A universal man, the Pantagruelist rendered his master other services than those of a doctor. He was his intermediary with several scholars. He corresponded particularly with the juriconsult Jean Boyssonné, whose Latin verses we have just quoted, with Guillaume Bigot, with Guillaume Pélicier, Bishop of Narbonne, then of Montpellier, and, at this time Ambassador of the King of France at Venice. We have two letters from this prelate to Rabelais. One of the 23rd July, the other of the 17th October, 1540, written in a friendly and familiar tone. In the second of these letters, it is a question of Hebrew and Syriac manuscripts and Greek books whose purchase the French Ambassador was negotiating. Pélicier asked the Hellenist monk to use all his credit to help the success of the negotiations. We do not know whether Rabelais made himself useful in this matter, but it succeeded according to the wishes of Pélicier, and the Oriental manuscripts acquired by the Ambassador still enrich our public institutions to-day.

It would appear that Master François, whom a prelate like the Bishop of Montpellier treated with such consideration, got into another scrape at Turin, owing to his indiscretion. He was so terrified by what he had done that he re-crossed the Alps madly and was found at Chambéry, out of his wits and not knowing where to go. We do not know what his error was, but it was doubtless less serious than he supposed, for, in the month of March, 1541, he was back in Turin, in the good graces of the Viceroy.

and receiving further letters from the Ambassador of the King of France at Venice

Alter three years of dogged labour, Langey assumed the defences of Piedmont ; but tortured by gout, exhausted by fatigue, powerless and unable, as he said, to serve his King any longer, save with his brain and his tongue, he asked for his congé and was carried back to his country on a litter. This valiant and clever man died at Saint-Symphorien, at the foot of Mount Tarare, between Lyons and Roanne, on the 9th January, 1543. François Rabelais, who was present at his death, relates that the last thoughts of this great captain were concerned with the future of the kingdom. "He employed the three or four hours before his death in vigorous words, serene and tranquil in sense, predicting what we have since seen in part, and expect in part to happen, although then the prophecies seemed strange, in no wise credible, and no prognostication had appeared of what he was predicting."

Langey's papers were not found after his death. A German servant was suspected of having stolen them, although this man seemed little capable of knowing their value. Questioned as to their disappearance, Rabelais replied that he had never thought of looking for these papers, as he thought they were locked up in the mule boxes, which had not been opened at all.

The will of Langey reads .

"Item to Sieur Rabelais and Messer Gabriel Taphenon, Doctors, the aforesaid testator wills and commands that there be paid to them, in addition to their salaries and fees, videlicet, to the said Rabelais, fifty Tours livres per annum until his heirs have furnished him or caused to be furnished to the Church a total of three Tours livres per annum ; to the aforesaid Taphenon, fifty crowns in one payment."

It is supposed that it was in execution of this clause that Rene du Bellay, Bishop of Mans, brother of Guillaume and Jean du Bellay, conferred upon Rabelais the living of Saint Christophe-du-Jambet, in the diocese of Mans, from which the former physician of Langey drew the revenue without being compelled to reside there.

Rabelais preserved a tender memory of his protector. In his Fourth Book, to which we shall soon come, he associated the end of the good knight Guillaume du Bellay with everything great, noble, mysterious, and terrible related by Plutarch about the death of geniuses, of heroes and of the great god Pan himself

To one of the wisest heroes of his book he attributed the hyperbolic statement that, so long as Langey was living, France lived in such happiness that the entire universe envied her, and that, immediately after his decease, she fell into the contempt of the whole world during many long years. Finally, he wrote in Latin a book about the high deeds of Langey, which another friend of that nobleman, Claude Massuau, translated into French, under the title : "The Stratagems, that is, the Processes and Tricks of War of the Valiant and Very Celebrated Knight Langey, at the Beginning of the Third Cæsarian War. Lyons. Seb. Gryphus, 1542." The Latin text and the French translation have both been lost

About this time the friendship of Etienne Doler and François

RABELAIS

Rabelais was violently sundered, and the worst faults were not, perhaps, on the side of Etienne This bookseller, greatly suspected of heresy, having reissued Pantagruel with all the passages likely to irritate the Sorbonne pedants, who had become more and more violent and cruel, Rabelais became frightened, and not without reason The danger was real, and the austere Dolet could rightly be reproached with having been as imprudent with others as he was with himself He might be accused of trying to compromise, betray and expose a friend It is not surprising that Rabelais hastened to disown so dangerous a publisher Rabelais was prudent, he feared the stake "I am by nature," said he, "sufficiently thirsty without becoming any more heated." Who can reproach him with this? As he was publishing at the same time an expurgated edition, he included a letter in which he makes the printer speak, but the style betrays him There he says expressly that Dolet "out of avarice subtracted a copy of this book while it was still in press" The accusation is inconceivable Dolet had merely to take one of the numerous copies of the old editions, and, if he had fraudulently procured copies of the new emended and expurgated edition, in order to copy them, his edition would have been equally expurgated and emended Under the name of his printer, Rabelais added that Dolet was a monster "born to injure and upset decent people" He was not very perspicacious, for he had taken ten years to discover this It is a sad adventure and an eternal one Whether it be humanism, intellectual and moral liberty, justice, or any other generous impulse, minds are stirred up in a powerful movement Between defenders of the same cause, between workers at the same task, men unite, support each other, encourage each other, and excite each other ; in this way the great task is lightened and easily achieved. Then men grow tired and stop. That is the bad moment for quarrels, recriminations, disputes, and the breaking up of friendships. Let us not be too severe upon Rabelais After all, he was only a man, and the exquisite qualities of his mind only rendered him more sensitive, more restless, and more irritable The brutal Dolet had brought him within an inch of imprisonment, of the stake , he had frightened him. Alas ! we are cruel only when we are afraid

THE THIRD BOOK

CHAPTER V

THE THIRD BOOK

MY friend Seignobos, Professor of History at the Sorbonne, speaking of a historical work of mine, reproached me, in gracious terms, with having concealed gaps in the texts, and also the sometimes narrow limits of our knowledge, by means of a closely knit narrative and a harmonious style. It was a flattering reproach, which my book did not deserve, and which this work will deserve even less. The biography of Rabelais, owing to the ravages of time and the negligence of man, is full of gaps which I shall not try to fill with any patches. All through his life there are gaps. These gaps occur during the entire period which must now be covered. After the death of the good knight, we lose sight of Master François, only to find him for a moment in Orléans at the table and in the house of Etienne Lorens, of Saint-Ay, whom he had known as a soldier in Langey's company and a Captain at Turin. Saint-Ay zealously served the King of France in secret negotiations. In 1545 Saint-Ay received Rabelais in his castle, which stood on a slope covered with vines on the banks of the Loire between Meung and Orléans. At the foot of the slope a well bubbled, by the side of which our author, they say, used to work. Later they used to point out a round stone table upon which he used to write. Etienne Lorens, who was one of the King's men, apparently liked to associate with scholarly people, with leanings toward the Reformation. Such was Antoine Hulot, to whom Rabelais wrote a letter from Saint-Ay, which has been preserved, by some chance, in which the inventor of Pantagruelism invited him philosophically to come and join the guests of Langey's old friend. He tries to lure him with the attraction of fish moistened with the wine of the country, which was excellent. Undoubtedly Rabelais was fond of food, but note that, when he speaks of banquets, he is usually thinking of a banquet of the Muses, and the wine which he extolled is the wine of wisdom. When inviting Antoine Hulot to the table of Saint-Ay, whose fish he praises, he says. "You will come, not when you please, but when you are impelled by the will of the good God, who was full of pity and never created Lent, but did create salads, herrings, haddocks, carps, pike, perch, umbrina, ablets, etc., item, good wines, especially one which is being held here for your arrival, as if it were the Holy Grail and a second essence, nay, the quintessence Ergo veni, domine, et noli tardare”

In 1545, Rabelais obtained from King François I the privilege of printing the Third Book of Pantagruel, which appeared the following year, under the title The Third Book of the Heroic Deeds and Sayings of the good Pantagruel, composed by Master François Rabelais, Doctor in Medicine and Patriarch of the Isles of Hyères The Author aforesaid beseeches the courteous readers to reserve their laughter till the Seventy-eighth Book

The First Book appeared in 1532, the Second Book about 1524, eight years earlier. During this long interval the author had lost the slender thread of his story. There is no link, so to speak, between the Third Book and its predecessors, yet Rabelais, when he resumed his story in his maturity, seems to recall the old days at Fontenay-le-Comte and to like working out the ideas which he exchanged with Judge André Tiraqueau, in the laurel grove, about women and marriage. The Third Book, in fact, is three-quarters full of the very detailed and very amusing consultation of Panurge on the question as to whether he can marry without disadvantage.

We shall now go through this marvellous Third Book, the richest and perhaps the most beautiful, the most wealthy in comic scenes of the entire Pantagruel. But let us remember first that this year 1546, which is marked by the appearance of this luminous and joyous work, was painful and sombre. François I, uneasy and in bad health, could no longer resist the cruel exigencies of the Sorbonne and of Parliament. The persecutors of thought were raging cruelly against the humanists, the philosophers, the scholars, the poets, against every one who favoured the Reformation of the Church and inclined, however little, towards Lutheranism. Clément Marot was dragging out his days in poverty and exile ; Bonaventure Despériers had committed suicide. Etienne Dolet had been hanged and burned in the Place Maubert in Paris , at Meaux, the cradle of the gentlest Reformers, fourteen stakes were lighted. In this melancholy atmosphere, in this smell of burning flesh, the voice was heard of this buffoon, full of wisdom.

When the Third Book opens and, after a long interval, the author continues the narrative of the high deeds of the good Pantagruel, we discover the son of Gargantua organising the country which he has just conquered. He transports a colony of Utopians to Dypsodie and assigns to Panurge the lairdship of Salnygondin. But Panurge conducts his affairs so badly that in a short time he is loaded with debts, but is not worried thereby As Fantasiai says : “ When you have debts and do not pay them you might as well not have them ” Panurge, who is much wittier than Fantasiai, is not content merely to enjoy his position as a debtor, he exalts it, he glorifies it and, on the basis of his debt, he not only establishes a theory of public credit but a whole philosophy of man and nature.

“ Debt,” he says, “ is as an union or conjunction of the Heavens with the Earth, and the whole cement whereby the race of mankind is kept together. Represent unto your self a world wherein it is to be supposed that there is no debtor or creditor There, amongst the planets will be no regular course and all will be in disorder      The moon will remain bloody and obscure for to what end should the sun impart unto her any of his light ? He owed her nothing . In such a world, without order and array, owing nothing, lending nothing, and borrowing nothing, you would see a more dangerous conspiracy than that which Æsop exposed in his epilogue, and the chafing soul, full of indignation, will take its flight to all the devils      On the contrary, be pleased to represent unto your fancy another world, wherein every one lendeth and every one oweth . . . O how great will that harmony be, which shall thereby result from the regular motions of the Heavens ! What sympathy will there be amongst the elements ! O how delectable then unto nature will be our own works and productions ? Whilst Ceres appeareth loaden with corn, Bacchus with wines, Flora with flowers, Pomona with fruits , then will among the race of mankind peace, love, benevolence, fidelity, tranquility, rest, banquets, feastings, joy, gladness, be found      ”

RABELAIS

Pantagruel is not convinced by these fine speeches “ Preach it up and patrocinate it, even from hence to the next Whitson-tide,” he replies to Panurge, “ yet will you be astonish’d to find how you shall have gained no ground at all upon me, nor persuaded me . From henceforwards do not hang upon creditors nor tie yourself to them , I make account, for the time past, to rid you freely of them ”

Pantagruel is a liberal and magnificent King, but an enemy of foolish prodigality.

Panurge, freed from his debts, and seeing his youth slip away from him, thought of marriage and consulted his master Pantagruel on this subject, as he did not wish to take any action without his advice.

“ It is my judgment (quoth Pantagruel), and I advise you to it ”

“ But if it were much better for me to remain as I am, I would rather choose not to marry ”

“ Then do not marry.”

“ Yea, but would you have me so solitarily drive out the whole course of my life without the comfort of a matrimonial consort ? You know it is written vae soli, and a single person is never seen to reap the joy and solace that is found with married folks ”

“ Then marry in the name of God ! ”

“ But if my wife should make me a . . . as it is not unknown to you how this hath been a very plentiful year in the production of that kind of cattel.”

“ Then do not marry, for this sentence of Seneca is infallibly true without all exception : what thou to others shalt have done, others will do the like to thee ”

“ Yet seeing I can no more want a wife, then a blind man his staff, were it not a great deal better for me to apply and associate my self to some one honest, lovely, and vertuous woman ? ”

“ Marry then ! ”

“ But if it were the will of God, and that my destiny did unluckily lead me to marry an honest woman who should beat me, I would be stor’d with more than two-third parts of the patience of Job, if I were not stark mad by it ”

“ Do not marry then ”

RABELAIS

“ But being alone and not married, nobody will be so regardful of me, or carry towards me a love like that which is said to be in conjugal affection And if by some mishap I should fall sick, I would be lookt to very waywardly. The wise man saith, where there is no woman (I mean the mother of a family and wife in the union of a lawful wedlock) the diseased are in danger. . ”

“ Marry then, in the name of God ! ”

“ But if being ill at ease and made unable to discharge the matrimonial duty, my wife should not only then not help and assist me in my extremity and need, but withal flout out and make sport of my calamity, or (which is worse) embezzle my goods and steal from me as I have seen it oftentimes befall ? ”

“ Do not marry then ”

“ Yea, but, I shall never by any other means come to have lawful sons and daughters, in whom I may harbour some hope of perpetuating my name and arms, and to whom also I may leave and bequeath my inheritances and with whom I may make merry, as I do perceive daily by the gentle and loving carriage of your kind and gracious father towards you ”

“ Marry then, in the name of God ! ”

An amusing consultation, of which we find the idea in the literature of the Middle Ages, and which Molière imitated in his Marriage forcé Can one say anything better than the wise Pantagruel ? There are good marriages and there are bad So what advice can one give ?

Let us consult, said Pantagruel, the Virgilian and Homeric lotteries

This consists, as we have already seen, in sticking a pin three times into a volume of Homer or Virgil and of taking as an oracle the lines picked. Panurge had recourse to this form of divination. Unfortunately he could draw no conclusion from the verses so marked. Pantagruel advised him to adopt divination by dreams.

“ In sleep,” said the good King, “ our soul delighteth to disport it self, and to take a review of its native country, which is the Heavens, where it receiveth a most notable participation of its first beginning, and in contemplation of that infinite and intellectual sphere, whereof the centre is every-where and the circumference is in no place, to which no new thing hap’neth, which nothing that is passed escapeth and unto which all things are alike present, remarketh not only what is preterite, and gone in the inferior course and agitation of sublunary matters, but withal taketh notice what is to come ; then bringeth a relation of those future events unto the body by the outward senses and exterior organs, it is divulged abroad unto the hearing of others Whereupon the owner of that soul deserveth to be turned vaticinator, or prophet.”

This famous definition of God, which is remarkable in that it perfectly defines the non-existence and absolute absence of God, occurs again, I need hardly say, in Pascal. To find its author we should have to go back to the Alexandrine philosophers and perhaps even to the Greek Empiricists. That would be a little long. Let us not leave Panurge.

He had recourse to divination by dreams and dreamt that he was married, that his wife caressed him in a thousand ways and attached to his forehead a pretty little pair of horns. He also dreamt that he was transformed into a tabor and she into a chough. This dream did not appear to be open to plausible and convincing explanation.

Pantagruel proposed that they should consult the Sibyl of Panzoust, and the good King immediately set out with Epistémon and Panurge. In three days they were transported from Utopia to Chinon. How was that? Let us be truthful, when it is agreeable. The truth is, Rabelais had forgotten that his Pantagruel was in Utopia in the North of China, or in some country thereabouts, it had completely slipped his memory. A delicious lapse, a sweeter sleep than that of old Homer. Cervantes makes Sancho ride on an ass which he has lost and for which he is searching with tears. Rabelais no longer knows on what Continent he has left his characters. How adorable is the negligence, the carelessness of genius!

Here, then, are our friends at Panzoust, near Chinon. So much the better! I prefer sweet Touraine to the prodigies of Utopia.

On the top of a hill, under a large and spacious chestnut tree, they were shown the house of the Sibyl. They entered and found in the chimney corner the old woman, ragged, toothless, blear-eyed, crook-shouldered, snivelling, making a soup of green cabbage with a rind of yellow bacon and an old unsavoury broth, savorados. An old savorados, I may explain, is a hollow bone, a marrow bone which is put into soup to give it a taste. In order to save expense, it is used several times, but when old it has less taste than in its fresh and savoury beginnings. It is a proof that, like the sorceresses of Thessaly, who stopped the course of the moon, like the witches who predicted the crown of Scotland to Macbeth on the Heath, like the fortune-tellers who live in garrets, like the trans-mediums who follow fairs in caravans, like all such people from ancient times to our own day, the old woman of Panzoust earns with difficulty her miserable livelihood, and we may well be astonished that people who attribute to themselves such extraordinary faculties derive such meagre profits from them. The Sibyl of Chinon remained silent for some time, pensive and showing her teeth, then she sat down on the bottom of a bushel, took her spindles and yarn-windles and placed her apron over her head. . . .

When in Rome Rabelais had seen in the Sistine Chapel the recently discovered Sibyls of Michelangelo. The Cumæan Sibyl is prouder, the Delphian nobler, but the Sibyl of Panzoust is more picturesque. Her words and gestures frightened Panurge, who took her for one possessed by the devil and invoking demons, and his only thought was to run away. He was afraid of devils, particularly because devils attracted theologians, who inspired him with a not unreasonable terror. Finally, the Sibyl wrote her article on eight sycamore leaves, which she scattered to the winds. Panurge and his companions breathlessly pursued them. Unfortunately, these verses were obscure and open to different interpretations. Pantagruel's reading was that Panurge would be deceived and beaten by his wife. As Panurge did not wish either to be deceived or beaten, he naturally understood them quite differently. That is human. We like to interpret things in a sense which flatters us.

In a word, as Pantagruel said, what was very clear was that the oracle was not clear. The good giant was inclined to consult a dumb man, oracles by gestures and signs being more truthful, they say. A dumb man whom they sent for made signs, but it was impossible to understand them. Pantagruel then proposed to question a decrepit old man who was near his end. The wise prince credited dying people with sibylline powers. "Angels, heroes and good demons," he said (according to the doctrine of Platonicks), "when they see mortals drawing near unto the harbour of the grave, free from the troubles and solitudes of this tumultuous and tempestuous world, hail and salute them, cherish and comfort them, and speaking to them lovingly, begin even then to bless them with illuminations, and to communicate unto them the abstrusest mysteries of divination."

Here Pantagruel seriously expresses his belief, and apparently Rabelais himself was not far from sharing it, for he cites, in a tone whose gravity and emotion cannot be denied, the example of Guillaume du Bellay, lord of Langrey, whose death he witnessed at Saint-Symphorien, as has already been related. Guillaume du Bellay, Rabelais says, employed the three or four hours before his death in vigorous words, serene and tranquil in sense, predicting what has since happened, in part Pantagruel, Epistémon, Panurge and Friar John, whom we had almost forgotten, went to the house of the old French poet, Raminagrobis, and found the good old man dying, with cheerful mein, open countenance and luminous eyes.

Panurge requested him to express his judgment on the problem of marriage. Raminagrobis sent for ink and paper and wrote a little poem, which begins as follows :

“ Take, or not take her,
Off or on .
Handy-dandy is your lot,
When her name you write, you blot ”

As these lines are also found in the works of Guillaume Crétin, there is reason to recognise this old poet in Raminagrobis

The dying man gave Panuige and his companions the verses which he had written and said . “ Go, my lads, in peace, the great God of the Highest Heaven be your guardian and preserver , and do not disquiet me with this or any other business whatsoever. I have this same very day (which is the last both of May and of me) with a great deal of labour, toil and difficulty, chased out of my house a rabble of filthy, unclean, and plaguily pestilentious rake-hells, black beasts, dust, dun, white, ash-coloured, speckled, whose obstrusive importunity would not permit me to die at mine own ease . for by fraudulent and deceitful pricklings, ravenous, harpie-like graspings, waspish stingings, forged in the shop of I know not what kind of insatiabilities , they went about—withdraw and call me out of those sweet thoughts, wherein I was already beginning to repose my self, and acquiesce in the contemplation and vision ; yea, almost in the very touch and taste of the happiness and felicity which the good God hath prepared for His faithful saints and elect in the other life, and state of immortality ”

Who were the filthy rabble that were besieging the dying man's bed ? The scandalised Panurge recognised them without hesitation as monks of all orders, Franciscans, Dominicans and other mendicant orders. There were four orders, grey and brown, of which we have made the four mendicants which are served at dessert in France during the winter Dried raisins, fried figs, almonds and walnuts

“ But what harm, in the devil’s name,” said the seeker of oracles, when he came out, “ have these poor devils, capucins and minims done unto him ? Are not these beggarly devils sufficiently wretched already ? Are they not thoroughly besmoaked and besmeared with misery, distress and calamity, these poor snakes, the very extracts of ichthyophagy ? . He goeth, before God, as surely damn’d to thirty thousand basketsfull of devils, as a pruning-bill to the lopping of a vine-branch. To revile with opprobrious speeches the good and couragious props and pillars of the Church, is that to be called a poetical fury ? ” [I am rather afraid that in the mind of our author the words should be pronounced pillagers of the Church ] He hath transgressed most enormously , his soul goes infallibly to thirty thousand panniersfull of devils ” He wrote âne (ass) instead of âme (soul), a misprint, no doubt, but it looks deliberate

These are evil-sounding words on the immortality of the soul In this year, 1546, they are enough to have the author and the book burned That year Etienne Dolet was burned and hanged in the Place Maubert in Paris for less, for three words translated from Plato But he was a serious man The jokes of Rabelais were not of any consequence He could say everything Nevertheless,

I think that he believed in the immortality of the soul, I think that he believed in it, at least five days out of seven, which is a lot.

Panurge has run down the stairs. Nothing in the world will make him return to the bedside of the old, dying poet. He is too much afraid of the hobgoblins. Rabelais is just as much afraid of the hobgoblins as Panurge. He fears them and defies them ; he defies them while fearing them ; he fears them while defying them. Before he expresses his opinion, he plays the fool. His audacity is wrapped up in buffoonery. He crams his text with all sorts of obscurities, as the nymph, surprised in her bath, troubles the waters of the fountain.

Then Panurge consults on the subject so near to his heart an astrologer named Her Trippa, who prophesies that his wife will deceive him. There is a learned consultation ; all the methods of divination are enumerated ; names succeed names interminably. They are drowned by them, and Panurge cannot forgive himself for having lost his time in the lair of this befrocked devil. On the advice of Friar John he listens to what the bells say. But he does not succeed in discovering what they say : marry, marry, marry, or marry not, marry not, marry not.

All forms of divination having proved vain and deceptive, the noble Pantagruel called a theologian, a doctor, a jurisconsult and a philosopher, to put an end to the complexities of Panurge.

The theologian, Hippothadee, the first to be consulted, spoke very well. To Panurge's question : " Shall I be deceived ? " he replied, " By no means, if it please God " From which Panurge concluded · “ I shall be, if it please God ” Thereupon, for his enlightenment, the good Father described the kind of wife he should take, descended of honest parents, instructed in piety and virtue, loving and fearing God.

“ You would have me then (quoth Panurge) to espouse and take to wife the prudent and frugal woman described by Solomon Without all doubt she is dead        Nevertheless, I thank you, Father ! ”

As for the doctor, Rondibilis, a great explorer of the secrets of nature, he frankly declared that the misfortune so greatly feared in advance by Panurge, naturally attended marriage He compared women to the moon and reproached them with their hypocrisy “ When I say womankind, I speak of a sex so frail, so variable, so changeable, so fickle, inconstant, and imperfect, that, in my opinion, nature (under favour nevertheless of the prime honour and reverence which is due unto her) did in a manner mistake the road which she had traced formerly and stray exceedingly from that excellence of providential judgment, by the which she had created and formed all other things, when she built, framed and made up the woman And having thought upon it a hundred and five times, I know not what else to determine therein, save only that in the devising, hammering, forging and composing of the woman, she hath had a much tenderer regard, and by a great deal more respectful heed to the delightful consortship, and sociable delectation of the man than to the perfection and accomplishment of the individual womanishness, or muliebrity The divine philosopher Plato was doubtful in what rank of living creatures to place and collocate them, whither amongst the rational animals, or with the irrational.”

In this connection Ponocrates tells a story, which was told before Rabelais, which has been told since, and which the reader doubtless knows. It is as follows.

“Pope John XXII, passing one day through the convent of Fontevrault, was asked by the Abbess and the Mothers to authorise them to make their confessions to each other, alleging that there are certain sins which the nuns could not reveal to a man without unbearable shame.

“‘We shall be able much more easily to tell them to each other.’

“‘I would willingly grant you what you ask,’ replied the Pope, ‘but I see one disadvantage. Confession must be kept secret, and you women would have great difficulty in keeping a secret.’

“‘We shall keep it very well,’ they replied, ‘and better than men do.’

“Before leaving them the Holy Father gave them a little box to keep in which he had placed a linnet, and he asked them to lock it up in some secure and secret place, promising them, on his Papal faith, that he would grant what they asked if they kept the box well hidden, and strictly forbidding them to open it under pain of ecclesiastical censure and eternal excommunication. This warning was no sooner uttered than they were dying to see what was in the box, and they longed for the Pope to go in order to satisfy their desire. Having given them his blessing, he retired. He was not gone more than three steps from the convent when the good Mothers rushed to open the forbidden box to see what was in it The next day the Pope paid them a visit and they expected him to give them the written permission to hear each other's confessions Before taking this matter up, he asked for the box to be brought to him It was given to him, but the little bird was no longer in it The Pope then pointed out to them that it would be too difficult for them to keep the secrets of the confessional since they had kept the secret of the box for so short a time "

Grécourt, having put this story into charming verse, added a rather clever stroke In his version, when the Pope, finding the box empty, refused to give the nuns permission to take the place of their confessors :

Tant mieux, reprit tout bas une nonnain,
Je n'étais pas pour la métamorphose.
Un confesseur est toujours quelque chose

The philosopher, Trouillogan, was consulted in his turn.

" Now, go on, in the name of God, should I marry ? " Panurge asked.

" There is some likelihood therein "

" But if I do not marry ? "

" I see in that no inconvenience "

" You do not ? "

" None, truly, if my eyes deceive me not "

" Yea, but I find more than five hundred "

" Reckon "

“ This is an impropriety of speech, I confess ; for I do no more thereby, but take a certain for an uncertain number. When I say, therefore, five hundred, my meaning is, many . . . Is it possible for me to live without a wife, in the name of all the subterranean devils ? . . . Shall I marry ? ”

“ Perhaps ”

“ Shall I thrive or speed well withal ? ”

“ According to the encounter.”

“ But if in my adventure, I encounter aright, as I hope I will, shall I be fortunate ? ”

“ Enough.”

“ What if I encounter ill ? ”

“ Then blame not me ”

“ But, of courtesie, be pleased to give me some advice : what must I do ? ”

“ Even what thou wilt ”

“ Wishee, washee , trolly, trolly ”

Panurge grows impatient, but he does not cease to ask questions :

“ Shall I marry ? If I never marry, I shall never be a cuckold ”

“ I thought so ”

“ Well, then, if I marry, I shall be a cuckold ”

“ One would say so ”

“ Yet, if my wife prove a vertuous, wise, discreet and chaste woman, I shall never be cuckolded ”

“ I think you speak congruously ”

RABELAIS

“ Will she be discreet and chaste ? This is the only point I would be resolved in ”

“ I question it.”

“ You never saw her ? ”

“ Not that I know of ”

“ Why do you then doubt that of which you know not ? ”

“ For a cause ”

“ And if you should know her ? ”

“ Yet more ”

At this point Panurge became very angry, and called his page

“ Page, my pretty little darling, take here my cap, go down to the lower court, swear there half an hour for me, and I shall in compensation of that favour, swear hereafter for thee as much as thou wilt ”

Molière, a great Rabelaisian, has introduced this scene into his Mariage forcé

Sganarelle I wish to marry —

Marphurius I know nothing of that —

Sganarelle I tell you so

Marphurius That may be

Sganarelle The girl I wish to take is young and very beautiful

Marphurius That is not impossible

Sganarelle Am I right or wrong in marrying her ?

Marphurius Both

Sganarelle I am greatly drawn to the girl

Marphurius That may be

Sganarelle Her father has given his permission

RABELAIS

Sganarelle But if I marry her, I am afraid I shall be deceived

Marphurius The thing has happened.

Sganarelle But what would you do in my place ?

Marphurius I do not know.

Sganarelle What do you advise me to do ?

Marphurius Whatever you please.

Judge Bridlegoose (the reader might be pardoned for having forgotten him), Judge Bridlegoose had been called to the consultation, but had not been able to come because he had to depart in haste for Myrelingues, where he had been called before the Parliament to answer for a judgment which he had pronounced. Pantagruel, who was anxious to follow this case, travelled to Myrelingues with his friends, Panurge, Epistémon, Friar John and the others

When they entered the Parliament Hall, President Trinquamelle was asking Bridlegoose how he had pronounced a certain judgment which did not seem at all equitable.

His only reason and excuse were that he had become old, that his sight was not as good as it used to be, that he could not recognise the points of the dice as distinctly as in the past and that, in pronouncing sentence in the case concerned, he must have taken a four for a five. There was nothing reprehensible in this, as the infirmities of nature should never be imputed unto any one for a crime

“ What kind of dice (quoth Trinquamelle) do you mean, my friend Bridlegoose ? ”

“ The dice of sentences at law, which your worships do, as

“In three things,” replied Bridlegoose. “First, for formality sake, the omission whereof that it maketh all whatever is done, to be of no force nor value is excellently well proved. Secondly, in lieu of some other honest and healthful exercise. Thirdly, I consider, as your own worships used to do, that time ripeneth and bringeth all things to maturity, that by time everything cometh to be made manifest patent, and that time is the father of truth.”

Bridlegoose, in this connection, tells the story of Peter Dandin, who was a very different person from his namesake in the Plaideurs. The Peter Dandin of Bridlegoose was not a judge, he was an old farmer of Poitou, known for thirty leagues around as a reconciler of law-suits. There was not a hog-kill within three parishes of him, whereof he had not some part of the haslet and puddings. He was invited almost every day to some banquet and he never made the litigants agree without having them drink together. In short, he alone ended more suits than were settled by the entire law-courts of Poitiers.

Now, his son, Tenot Dandin, also wanted to take up this business of reconciling litigants, but he could not succeed at all and could not even manage to compose the slightest difference, on the contrary, he irritated and exasperated more than ever the parties whom he wished to soothe and calm.

“Thou hast not the skill and dexterity of composing differences,” said the old man to him. “Why?” “Because thou takest them at the beginning, in the very infancy and bud as it were, when they are green, raw and indigestible; yet I know handsomely and featly how to compose and settle them all ” “ Why ? ”

 “ Because I take them at their decadence, in their weaning, and when they are pretty well digested, when the purses of the parties are empty At that moment the fat of bacon is not more relishing to boiled pease than I ”

“ For this cause,” Bridlegoose concluded, “ I temporise, waiting patiently for the maturity of the process ”

Bridlegoose having finished the speech in his defence, the court ordered him to withdraw, and looked to Pantagruel to pronounce judgment The wise prince, in consideration of the fact that, of the innumerable judgments pronounced by Bridlegoose, only one seemed to be ill-founded, was of the opinion that there was no ground for proceeding against him

That is one of the best stories of Rabelais, one of the best that has ever been related at any time and in any country, even in the country of La Fontaine and in the country of Quevedo

The author of The Barber of Seville borrowed Bridlegoose from our author and made him into Bridoison Bridoison was stupid Bridlegoose was naïve and we learn a great truth from him We should meditate upon it and never forget it Whether the decisions of the courts are founded on law, or decided by the chance of dice, they are neither better nor worse That is the valuable conclusion to be drawn from this story It was written by the son of a man of the law Rabelais, as we know to-day, was cradled in lawyer’s bags, and nourished on chicanery

Still concerned about marriage, Panurge questioned the fool named Triboulet. Sometimes, indeed, the truth is heard in the mouths of simpletons. Mad though he was, Triboulet did not speak any more clearly than the doctors and lawyers, and his last hope was disappointed like the others. The great consultation ends with Triboulet. Panurge decided to go and question the Oracle of the Holy Bottle

“ I am acquainted,” he said to Pantagruel, “ with a prudent, understanding, and discreet gentleman, and besides a very good friend of mine, who knoweth the land, country and place where its [temple and Oracle is built and posited, he will guide and conduct us thither sure and safely Let us go thither, I beseech you. I have a long time known you to be a great lover of peregrination, desirous still to learn new [things and still to see what you have never seen before.”

Pantagruel agreed to guide Panurge to the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, but not without first having obtained the permission of King Gargantua, his father, who had got back mysteriously from the land of the fairies. At the same time, this dutiful son declared that he would never marry without his father's consent This gave Gargantua an opportunity to pronounce an eloquent, generous, indignant discourse against those who induce children to marry without the knowledge and consent of their father and mother.

“ Could the Goths, the Scyths, or Massagets, do a worse or more cruel act to any of the inhabitants of a hostile city, when, after a long siege they shall have stormed and taken it by a violent and impetuous assault ? May not these fathers and mothers be sorrowful and heavy hearted when they see an unknown fellow, a vagabond stranger, a barbarous lowt, by an open rapt, snatch away before their own eyes their so fair, delicate, richly provided for, and healthful daughter, on whose breeding and education they had spared no cost nor charges, by bringing them up in an honest discipline, to all the honourable and vertuous employments, hoping by these commendable and industrious means in an opportune and convenient time to bestow them on the worthy sons of their well-deserving neighbours and ancient friends, who had nourished and schooled their children with the same care and solicitude, that from them might issue an offspring and progeny no less heirs to the laudable endowments and exquisite qualifications of their parents, than to their personal and real estates, movables and inheritances ? ”

Against whom is Rabelais (for it is certainly he who is speaking through the words of the giant) so eloquently and powerfully indignant ? Against the Nysts, he says He does not dare to indicate them more clearly. But, when the book appeared, every one recognised in these Nysts the monks who suborned daughters and married them without the knowledge and against the wishes of their parents This was one of the most greatly feared plagues which attacked the home at that time These monks based their detestable practices on canon law “ I well know,” says Pasquier in his Recherches sur la France, “ that for several hundred years certain monks, patching together ancient glosses, have insinuated this brutal and barbarous opinion that, according to canon law, the consent of parents to the marriage of their children was required only as a point of honour and not as a matter of necessity" It was against these suborners and clandestine marriage-makers that Rabelais protested vehemently The reader will observe on this occasion how he can employ every tone, the most noble and the most familiar, and how he can pass, when he pleases, from the comic to the pathetic

After having taken leave of the good King Gargantua, his father, Pantagruel set out for the Court of Thalassa, near St Malo, accompanied by Panurge, Epistémon, Friar John and others of the royal household

He began to equip his ships, and particularly he had them loaded with great quantities of an herb called Pantagruelion. What is this herb? To judge by the description which Rabelais gives of it, it is hemp In four chapters the author defines its characteristics, describes its various uses, praises its qualities, and recommends its virtues. In this section, which closes his Third Book, he proves himself to be a botanist as accurate as he is enthusiastic. This great man may be mentioned amongst the creators of botany, for he was the first to have any idea of the sex of plants

Thus, in a magnificent and unforeseen manner, this marvellous Third Book closes, so rich in excellent comedy scenes, from which Molière freely borrowed. In the whole of French literature I know of no pages so rich in style and so full of sense

CHAPTER VI

AFTER having given his Fourth Book to the printer, during the first days of 1546, Rabelais went to the imperial city of Metz with the former Captain of Turin, the same Etienne Lorens who had received him so well, a few years earlier, in his castle at Saint-Ay, on the banks of the Loire Etienne Lorens, a secret agent of the King, was engaged in negotiations for his master It has been thought that his friend Rabelais had fled as far as the walls of Metz from the fury of the hobgoblins It is true that Pantagruelism was not in good odour with the Sorbonne nor the Parliament, and that the King and his sister, the Queen of Navarre, could no longer do anything for their friends suspected of heresy and impiety. It is true that Judge Tiraqueau, having become a member of Parliament and very zealous in the defence of orthodoxy, erased the name of François Rabelais from all his writings. But our author still had powerful protectors, the Bishops of Paris, of Mans, of Tulle, of Montpellier, Cardinal de Châtillon, and Pantagruel was regarded, quite wrongly, it is true, as a buffoonery of no consequence. According to the happy researches of M Henri Clouzat, it would seem that Master François quietly installed himself in the house which the Lord of Saint-Ay owned in the city of Metz.

From there he wrote to Cardinal du Bellay a very humble request for a little money.

“ If you do not take pity upon me,” he said, “ I know not what will become of me, unless, as a last despairing refuge, I place myself in the service of somebody here, to the obvious loss and damage to my studies ”

He protests that it is impossible for him to live more frugally than he does. All that he asks is to be able to “ keep body and soul together ” and live decently, as he has done up to that time, for the honour of the house to which he belonged when he left France. This letter is very humble, no doubt, but it is remarkable for its threats. Master François, Doctor of Medicine, says politely to the Cardinal Bishop · “ If you continue to subsidise me, I am yours ; if you do not, I shall give myself to another, as my condition and station in life demand ” The du Bellay family were distinguished and honourable, but they were not very well off It will be remembered that Langey, on his death, owed his Doctor a great deal Rabelais was well aware that, in order to be heard by the great, one must knock loudly and often and not be afraid of seeming importunate Saint-Ay undertook to transmit the letter to the Cardinal Bishop, but he did not add the slightest word of recommendation, doubtless because he knew that in his house Rabelais was not lacking in the necessities of life

Rabelais was so much the less to be pitied in Metz that, in April 1547, he had been accepted as a stipendiary physician at the Hôtel-Dieu He remained a full year in the service of the Republic, at an average salary of one hundred and twenty livres, and the inhabitants of Metz were so pleased with him that the authorities granted him three months' salary as a gratification, so he "kept body and soul together" fairly well

François I died on the 31st March, 1547 Henri II, who succeeded him, unlike his father, had no taste for art, literature, and the graces of the mind His intelligence was limited, his heart small, and it could be foreseen that the French Lutherans, under the new prince, would be more bitterly persecuted than they had been even during the last years of the late King, which were so filled with torture The first act of the sovereign confirmed all the fears of the Moderates Henri II established in Parliament a special chamber to expedite trials for heresy

Cardinal du Bellay, whose credit was not so great at the new Court, preferring to serve his King from a distance, returned to Rome and lived there in an exile disguised as an Embassy This time again he called Rabelais to him, and the latter was in the Eternal City in the month of February, 1549, at the time of the birth of Louis of Orléans, the second son of Henri II and of Catherine de' Medici. We know in what contempt this great mind held astrologers and how he mocked at those who believed that there are stars in the heavens for princes but not for beggars. However, whether to please the Ambassador, or to obtain the King's favour, he drew the horoscope of the new-born child, and predicted a favourable fate for him, provided he escaped a certain sad phase of the Western angle of the Seventh House. This astrologer, in spite of himself, who knew his Virgil, probably remembered those lovely lines in the Sixth Book of The Æneid :

Heu, miserande puer, si qua fata aspera rumpas !
Tu Marcellus eris

But Virgil, when he made the old man, Anchises, predict the premature death of Octavia's son, was merely announcing an event which had happened. Rabelais risked a happier prophecy. The royal child did not even reach the Seventh House, and his death proved the falseness of a horoscope whose imposture was known as well and better to Master François than to any one else, for he had denounced the abuses and the vanity of the art of Ramon Lull and of divination by reading the Heavens.

On the occasion of this birth, Cardinal du Bellay and the Ambassador of France held a fête in Rome and, particularly a sciomachia, or mimic battle, of which Rabelais sent a description to the Cardinal de Guise, whom we are not surprised to find protecting the old age of Rabelais, for the Civil War had not yet broken out, the Guises were not yet the leaders of the Roman and Spanish Catholics, and Friar François, if he was not a Papist, was even less a Calvinist. The Reformer, Théodore de Bèze, who had formerly praised him, now regarded him as the Beast of the Apocalypse, and a monster full of iniquity. This was no reason why he should be spared, on the contrary, he received the blows of both parties, to the Catholics he was a Reformer, a Papist to the Reformers. While he was living in Rome with Cardinal du Bellay, in France a monk of Fontevrault named Gabrielle de Puuts-Herbault, in Latin Putherbus, attacked him violently in a book called Theotimus, which was widely read. It is possible, as has recently been said, that the animosity of this monk against Pantagruelism was for particular reasons, and that it owed its origin to the fact that Rabelais, in his great Pantraguuelian comedy, had made fun, under the name of Picrochole, of a Sainte-Marthe, a friend of Puuts-Herbault. However, it is impiety, disbelief, Calvinism, with which the Theotimus reproaches Master François, and the attack is quite general and comprehensive, since it includes du Bellay and the indulgent prelates of the Church in France. The angry monk sends Rabelais to Calvin and wishes he could send him to the devil.

“Would to God,” he cries, “that he were in Geneva, he and his Pantagruelism, if he is still alive ! For at the beginning of this reign, he had followed the rabble of dismissed Cardinals relegated to Rome.”

He paints for us a drunken, gluttonous, cynical Rabelais, a false portrait, which for a long time was to be considered true.

If he had numerous enemies, he had also powerful protectors, and perhaps he had more at the Court of Henri II than he had at that of the late King, who nevertheless was a reader, they say, and an admirer of Pantagruel. He was well considered by the Guises and by Cardinal Odet de Châtillon. When he returned to France, not only was he never disturbed, but, already Curé of St Christophe-du-Jambet in the diocese of Mans, on the 18th of January, 1550, he was appointed Curé of Meudon, near Paris. If we may rely on ancient testimony, which is not without its value, he fulfilled the duties of his curacy with great dignity and devotion.

“ His house (at Meudon),” according to Antoine Leioy, his oldest biographer, “ while closed to women, was open to scholars, with whom he loved to converse. He detested ignorance, especially in ecclesiastics, and when characterising illiterate priests, he would recover the satirical verve of the author of Pantagruel Quos vocaret Isidis asellos. For the rest, these were the only people towards whom he was lacking in charity. The poor were always certain of receiving help from his purse. His integrity was so great that he was never known to fail to keep his word with anybody. His medical knowledge had rendered him doubly useful to his parish ”

Guillaume Colletet afterwards bore witness also to the virtues of the Curé of Meudon .

“ He filled his curacy with all the sincerity, all the kindness and all the charity to be expected of a man who is anxious to fulfil his duty. At least, neither by tradition, nor otherwise, can we find any complaint lodged against his morals or his care of his flock. On the contrary, there is every evidence that his flock was very pleased with him, as may be inferred from certain letters which he wrote to some of his friends, which have still been preserved by the curious and which I have seen, where he says, amongst other things, that he has good and pious parishioners in the persons of Monsieur and Madame de Guise (the Duke and the Cardinal de Guise had just bought the castle of Meudon), a proof of the great care with which he discharged his duty and won the affection of those whose spiritual direction had been entrusted to him by his Bishop ”

We cannot doubt that Rabelais acquitted himself becomingly and devotedly of the ministry which he had assumed. But that he could for long submit to a sedentary existence is denied by his whole wandering, vagabond, curious life, the insatiable desire of his soul to see and know. Despite what Colletet and Leroy say, it is not certain that this good man resided very strictly in his parish, and, as a matter of fact, we learn that, on the occasion of the pastoral visit of his bishop, Eustache du Bellay, nephew of Cardinal Jean, in the month of June, 1551, Pierre Richard, Vicar, and four assistants were present in the parish of Meudon, the Curé was absent.

For the rest, Rabelais, who never settled down anywhere, remained Curé of Meudon only for the space of two years, less a few days. He resigned both his curacies on the 9th of January, 1552, why we know not. The end of his life, which we are approaching, is wrapped in profound obscurity.

A few days after this double resignation, the Fourth Book of Pantagruel appeared for the first time in its entirety. The first chapters had been published at Grenoble in 1547. The Fourth Book, complete, was finished by Michel Fezandat, bookseller in Paris, on the 28th January, 1552, and appeared with the privilege of the King and an epistle to Monsignor Odet, Cardinal de Châtillon.

This book, whose publication was separated from that of the Third Book by only a very short interval of time, is a continuation of the latter, and contains the journey of Pantagruel and his companions in search of the Oracle of the Holy Bottle. We shall now go through it, and not without pleasure assuredly, for it is full of excellent and precious passages. Further excellent scenes of human comedy are unfolded, although allegory, with its frigid fictions, too often takes the place of that movement, that tumult of life, which is so entertaining in the earlier books.

THE FOURTH BOOK

CHAPTER VII

THE FOURTH BOOK

THE Fourth Book is entirely filled by the journey of Pantagruel and his companions in search of the Holy Bottle. What is this journey? M. Abel Lefranc, professor at the Collège de France, believes that the answer is certain. "It is the journey which so occupied the minds of geographers and navigators from the time of the Renaissance down to our own day - the journey from the coast of Europe to the Western Coast of Asia, through the famous North-West passage in the North of America, which had been so often sought in vain, and whose practical impossibility has been definitely established only a few years ago."

The good giant and his court embark at Thalassa, quite close to St. Malo. Now St. Malo is the port from which Jacques Cartier set out and to which he returned when, from 1534 to 1542, he traced the course of the St. Lawrence River and the map of Newfoundland. At St. Malo they still said in the seventeenth century that Rabelais had learned his marine and piloting terms from this navigator, and M. Abel Lefranc believes that the pilot Xenomanes, who conducts the Pantagruelian fleet, is none other than Jacques Cartier himself, pilot of the King of France. It is possible We shall not argue about it.

There is no interest in knowing whether the pilot Xenomanes is Jacques Cartier or anybody else, since Rabelais has not given him any particular character, any appearance peculiarly his own. Neither do we need to follow too attentively on the map the itinerary of Pantagruel, who puts in only at allegorical islands, and whose voyage is mainly satirical

What is true, however, is that the author, very jealous of the greatness and power of France, as usual, and very careful to praise the King, his master, shows here as elsewhere his great interest in the progress of the naval forces of the Kingdom, and when King Henri II, at the beginning of his reign, in 1547, had new ships constructed, Master François in the Second Edition of his Fourth Book adds triremes, galleons, men of war, and feluccas to the fleet of the good Pantagruel, who did not know what to do with them. But it pleased him to endow with these new and magnificent vessels the navigators who had set out in search of the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, in order to exalt the Navy of his King, at a time when French navigators were trying to get a share of the New World Rabelais was in favour of large armaments I do not know whether he encouraged naval construction without foreseeing the excess of expenditure, one thing certain is, that he was not working for a syndicate of ship-builders, furnishers, and financiers. Then, as now, there were greedy contractors who robbed the King When they were too rich, the King despoiled them. Such were the order and economy of finance in the matter of public works at this period

On the fourth day the navigators put in at the island called Medamothi, "of a fine and delightful prospect, by reason of the vast number of light-houses, and high marble towers in its circuit," but which, as its Greek name means Nowhere, might well not exist I should not mention it, if Gymnast had not bought there for Pantagruel the story of Achilles in seventy-eight pieces of silk tapestry, embossed with gold and silver, which made a fine suite It is not out of vain caprice that the author shows us these tapestries At that very time Henri II, in order to encourage the cloth industry in his Kingdom, had had executed, at his own expense, tapestries of the finest quality, and Rabelais, whom this luxury did not cost much, unfolds the history of Achilles in seventy-eight pieces to the glory of French industry

In the course of the Journey, Pantagruel drew the gozal from the basket in which it was shut The gozal is a pigeon, from the dove-cotes of Gargantua Attaching a knot of white silk to its foot, as a sign that all was well, Pantagruel released it on the deck and the gozal flew in rapid flight towards the distant dove-cote, bearing news of the navigators in his white knot. It is a messenger pigeon, a carrier pigeon, which is not, as we see, a modern invention.

On the fifth day of the crossing, they sighted a ship. The passengers on board came from Lantern-land and they were all natives of Saintonge. They saluted and hailed each other. Panurge, who was taken on board the vessel from Lantern-land, got into a quarrel with a sheep-merchant named Dindenault, who called him a dark lantern of anti-Christ. I forgot to say that Panurge had fastened his spectacles to his cap, which Dindenault found extremely ridiculous. The quarrel became very venomous. However, Pantagruel succeeded in calming him down. Panurge and Dindenault drank each other's health. Panurge, who was seeking revenge and was not frank, emptied a second bumper of wine to the merchant's health and begged him to sell him one of his sheep. Dindenault, who was really rather a difficult person to approach and very ungracious, took these overtures in bad part.

"Nay," said he to Panurge, "you seem a rare chapman! O what a mighty sheep-merchant you are! In good faith, you look liker one of the diving trade than a buyer of sheep. "

Panurge would not be put off and became more pressing.

"Be so kind as to sell me one of your sheep, come, how much?"

"My friend," replied the merchant, "they are meat for none but kings and princes, their flesh is so delicate, so savoury, and so dainty that one would swear it melted in the mouth. I bring them out of a country where the very hogs, God be with us, live on nothing but mirabolans. The sows in their styes when they lie-in (saving the honour of this good company), are fed only with orange flowers ”

“ But,” said Panurge, “ drive a bargain with me for one of them, and I will pay you for’t like a king ”

Dindenault replied only with hyperbolical and prolix praise of his sheep. He praised their shoulders, legs, chests, livers, spleen, tripes, ribs, heads and horns

The skipper of the ship suddenly interrupted .

“ What a fidle fadle have we here ? There is too long a lecture by half, sell him one if thou wilt , if thou won’t, don’t let the man lose more time ”

“ I will for your sake,” said the merchant, “ but then he shall give me three livres French money for each, and pick and chuse ”

“ ’Tis a woundy price,” cry’d Panurge, “ in our country I could have five, nay six, for the money ”

“ A murrain seize thee for a blockheaded booby,” cried Dindenault, whose language was rough but who was very learned, “ the worst in this flock is four times better than those which the Coraxians us’d to sell for a gold talent each.”

“ Sweet sir, you fall into a passion, I see,” return’d Panurge “ Well, hold, here is your money ”

Having paid the merchant, he chose from the flock a large and beautiful sheep and carried it off, crying and bleating. Meanwhile all the others began to bleat and watch where their companion was being taken Dindenault was saying .

“ Ah ! how well the knave could chuse him out a ram, the whoreson has skill in cattle ! ”

Suddenly, without saying a word, Panurge threw his sheep, crying and bleating, into the sea. Crying and bleating, all the other sheep began to throw themselves overboard after him. They competed as to who should jump first. It was not possible to restrain them. It is the nature of sheep, as we know, to follow the leader wherever he may go. Wherefore, Aristotle says that the sheep is the most inept and stupid animal in the world.

The merchant, frightened at seeing his sheep drowning and perishing before his eyes, tried to prevent them and to hold them back with all his strength. But it was in vain. At last, he laid hold of a large sturdy one by the fleece on the deck of the ship, hoping to keep it back and thereby save the others. But the sheep was so strong that he dragged the merchant with him into the sea. The ship being freed of the merchant and of the sheep “ Is there,” asked Panurge, “ ever another sheepish soul left lurking on board ? Where are those of Toby Land, and Robin Rand, that sleep whilst the rest are a feeding ? Faith, I can’t tell my self. This was an old coaster’s trick : what think’st thou of it, Friar John ? ”

“ Rarely perform’d,” answer’d Friar John, “ only methinks you ought not to have paid your man, and the money had been sav’d ”

“ A fig for the money,” cried Panurge, “ have I not had about fifty thousand pounds’ worth of sport ? Come, now, let’s begone, the wind is fair, hark you me, my friend John, never did man do me a good turn, but I return'd or at least acknowledg'd it No, I scorn to be ungrateful, I never was, nor ever will be never did man do me an ill one without rueing the day that he did it either in this world or the next."

Such is the most famous episode of the Fourth Book, the episode of the sheep of Panurge, which ought rather to be called the sheep of Dindenault Rabelais did not invent it, he took the whole story from an Italian monk, Teofile Folengo, who related it very wittily in Macaronic verse La Fontaine took it from Rabelais, in his turn, and made of it a story which must seem, I am afraid, rather lifeless compared with its model

After the adventure with the sheep, the travellers next came to the island of Ennasin, the inhabitants of which have triangular faces, to the island of Chely, where everybody makes grimaces, and to Pettifogging, which as its name indicates, is the country of pettifoggers, the land of chicanery An inhabitant of the island explained to Pantagruel how the Catchpolls make their livelihood by being thrashed, so that if they were long without a beating, they would die of hunger, they, their wives and children

"When a monk," says the author, "Levite, close-fisted usurer or lawyer, owes a grudge to some neighbouring gentleman, he sends to him one of these Catchpolls, who nabs or at least cites him, thumps, abuses and affronts him impudently By natural instinct and according to his pious instruction, insomuch that if the gentleman hath got any guts in his brain, and is not more stupid than a Giron frog, he will find himself oblig'd either to apply a foggot-stick or his sword to the rascal's jobbornol, or make him cut a caper out at the window, by way of correction. This done, Catchpoll is rich for four months at least, as if bastinadoes were his real harvest, for the monk, Levite, usurer or lawyer will reward him roundly, and my gentleman must pay him such swinging damages, that his acres may bleed for't, and he be in danger of miserably rotting within a stone doublet, as if he had struck the King."

This is what Racine has so prettily staged in Les Plaideurs.

(Acte II, sc iv)

Panurge tells the story of a certain lord of Basché, who could thrash the Catchpolls on the pretext of amusing them. This gentleman, in his turn, related beneath the arbour the story of François Villon, and the sacristan of the Franciscans of St. Maixent. Here is the passage, perhaps the most wonderful, for its style and movement, of the entire prodigious work which we have been studying.

“ Master François Villon, in his old age, retired to St. Maixent in Poitou, under the patronage of a good, honest Abbot of the place, there to make sport for the mob he undertook to get the Passion acted after the way and in the dialect of the country, The parts being distributed, the play having been rehears’d, and the stage prepar’d he told the Mayor and Alderman that the mystery might be ready after Niort Fair, and that there only wanted properties and necessaries, but chiefly clothes fit for the parts.

“ Villon, to dress an old clownish father Greybeard, who was to represent God the Father, beg’d of Friar Stephen Tickletohy, Sacristan to the Franciscan Friars of the place, to lend him a cope and stole. Tickletohy refus’d him, alledging that by their provincial statutes, it was rigorously forbidden to give or lend anything to players. Villon reply’d that the statute reached no farther than farces, drolls, anticks, loose and dissolute games, and that he ask’d no more than what he had seen allow’d at Brussels and other places. Tickletohy, notwithstanding, peremptorily bid him provide himself elsewhere if he would and not to hope for anything out of his monastical wardrobe for he certainly would have nothing “Villon gave an account of this to the players, as of a most abominable action ; adding that God would shortly revenge himself and make an example of Tickletohy.

“The Saturday following he had notice given him, that Tickletohy upon the filly of the convent was gone a mumping to St. Ligarius and would be back about two in the afternoon. Knowing this, he made a cavalcade of his devils of the Passion through the town. They were all rigg’d with wolves, calves, and rams’ skins, lac’d and trim’d with sheeps’ heads, bulls’ feathers and large kitchen tenter-hooks, girt with broad leathern girdles, whereat hang’d dangling huge cow-bells and horse-bells, which made a horrid din. Some held in their claws black sticks full of squibs and crackers, others had long lighted pieces of wood, upon which at the corner of every street they flung whole handfuls of rosin-dust, that made a terrible fire and smoak.

“Having thus led them about, to the great diversion of the mob, and the dreadful fear of little children, he finally carried them to an entertainment at a summer-house without the gate that leads to St. Ligarius. As they came near the place, he spy’d Tickletohy afar off, coming home from mumping.

“ ‘ A plague on his friarship (said the devils then), the lowliest beggar would not lend a poor cope to the Fatherly Father, let us frighten him ’

“ ‘ Well said,’ cry’d Villon, ‘ but let us hide our selves till he comes by, and then charge home briskly with your squibs and burning sticks ’

“Tickletohy being come to the place, they all rush’d on a sudden into the road to meet him, and in a frightful manner threw fire from all sides upon him and his filly foal, ringing and tinging their bells, and howling like so many real devils, hho, hho, hho, hho, brrou, rrou, rrourrs, rourrs, hoo, hou, hou, hho, hho, hhoi, Friar Stephen, don't we play the Devils rarely ?

“ The filly was soon scar'd out of her seven senses, and began to start, to bound it, to gallop it, to kick it, to curvet it with double jerks : insomuch that she thiew Tickletohy, tho' he held fast by the tree of the pack-saddle with might and main : now his traps and stirrups were of cord, and on the right side, his sandle was so entangled and twisted, that he could not for the heart's blood of him get his foot Thus he was drag'd about by the filly through the road, she still multiplying her kicks against him and straying for fear, over hedge and ditch , insomuch that she trepann'd his thick skull so, that his cockle brains were dash'd out near the Osanna, or High Cross Then his arms fell to pieces, one this way and t'other that way, and even so were his legs serv'd at the same time , then she made a bloody havock with his puddings and being got to the convent, brought back only his right foot and twisted sandle “ Villon, seeing that things had succeeded as he intended, said to his devils .

“ ‘ You will act rarely, gentlemen devils, you will act rarely ; I dare engage you'll top your parts I defie the devils of Saumur, Douay, Montmorillon, Langez, St Espain, Angers ; nay, by Gad, even those of Poitiers, for all their bragging and vapouring, to match you ’ ”

This death of the miser Tickletohy, dragged by his filly, makes me think, in spite of myself, of the death of the impious Pentheus, torn to pieces by the Bacchantes. In the Greek tragedy the end of Pentheus is as terrible as the end of Tickletohy is comic in the Pantagruelian story, but the monk of St. Maixent and the king of Thebes were both guilty of an offence against something divine. The one does not recognise a god, the other offends a poet. The punishment of each of them was inevitable, necessary, and in conformity with universal order, the burlesque of Rabelais equals in grandeur the pathos of Euripides.

Having left the island of the Catchpolls, the fleet of Pantagruel encountered a terrible storm. The sea swelled mountain-high, the heavens thundered; the air grew dark, there was no other light than that of the flashes of lightning, the ship strained under the assault of the gigantic waves.

Crouching on the deck, Panurge trembles, invokes all the saints and laments:

“O twice and thrice happy those that plant cabbages! O Destinies, why did you not spin me for a cabbage planter? O how few are they to whom Jupiter hath been so favourable as to predestinate them to plant cabbage? They have always one foot on the ground and the other not far from it. For as good a reason as the philosopher Pyrrho being in the same danger, and seeing a hog near the shoar, eating some scatter’d oats, declar’d it happy in two respects, first, because it had plenty of oats, and besides that it was on shoar, hah, for a divine and princely habitation commend me to the cow’s floor . . . this wave will sweep us away, blessed Saviour ! O, my friends ! a little vinegar bous, bous, bous. I am lost for ever Otto, to, to, I'm drowned ! ”

Friar John, who had stripped to his doublet in order to help the sailors, addressed him in passing .

“ Odzooks, Panurge the calf, Panurge the whiner, Panurge the brayer, would it not become thee much better to lend us here a helping hand, than to lie lowing like a cow, as thou dost, sitting there like a bald baboon ? ”

But Panurge wept and groaned all the more

“ Friar John, my friend, my good father, I am drowning , I am a dead man. I am drowning the water is got into my shoes by the collar ”

“ Come hither and help us (said Friar John) , in the name of thirty legions of black devils, come, will you come ? ”

“ Don't let us swear at this time,” said Panurge , “ to-morrow as much as you please Holos, holos, alas, our ship leaks Above eighteen palefuls of water are got down my gullet Bous, bous, bous How damn'd bitter and salt it is ! ”

“ By the vertue (said Friar John) of the blood, if I hear thee again howling, I'll maul thee worse than any sea-wolf . . . hold fast above ! in truth here is a sad lightning and thundering , I think that all the devils are got loose, or else Madam Proserpine is in child's labour, all the devils dance a Morrice ”

“ Oh,” said Panurge, “ you sin, Friar John It goes against my heart to tell it you , for I believe this swearing doth your spleen a great deal of good nevertheless you offend ”

He continues to lament

“ I see neither Heaven nor Earth. Would it were the pleasure of the worthy divine bounty, that I were at this present hour in the close at Seulle, or at Innocent’s the Pastry-Cook, over against the painted wine-vault at Chinon, though I were to strip to my doublet, and bake the petty pasties my self . . . ”

The storm having subsided and the ship being on the point of entering the harbour, Panurge recovers all his courage and all his assurance :

“ Oh, oho ! ” quoth Panurge, “ all is well, the storm is over Shall I help you still here ? ”

Rabelais is a great comic writer. His only equals are Aristophanes, Molière and Cervantes. His storm is a great scene of human comedy which closes with a touch that is for ever admirable As for the description of the sea and the sky, it is confused and seems to be based less upon the spectacle of nature than upon literary memories. We must wait until Pierre Loti, or at least Bernardin de St. Pierre, to find in a book a storm that has been felt and seen

The port where the fleet of Pantagruel put in after the storm is that of the Macréons, whose island, formerly wealthy, busy and populous, is now poor and deserted by the injury of time There, in a dark forest, amongst ruined temples, obelisks and ancient tombs, the demons and the hero dwell

An old man relates to the travellers the vicissitudes caused by the life and death of the sublime inhabitants of the forest, and reveals to them, at the same time, the cause of the storm from which they have escaped with such difficulty

“ We believe,” said the good Macrobius, “ that some one of them dy’d yesterday, and at his death there arose this horrible storm , for while they are alive, all happiness attends both this and the adjacent islands, and a settled calm and serenity At the death of every one of them we commonly hear in the forest loud and mournful groans, and the whole land is infested with pestilence and other calamities , the air with fogs and obscurity, and the sea with storms and hurricanes ”

Pantagruel, who is quite ready to adopt these ideas, himself supplies an explanation of them

“ As a torch or candle, as long as it hath life enough and is lighted, shines round about, disperses its light, delights those that are near it, yields them its service and clearness, and never causes any pain or displeasure , but as soon as ’tis extinguished, its smoak and evaporation infects the air, offends the bystanders and is noisom to all so, as long as those noble and renowned souls inhabit their bodies, peace, profit, pleasure and honour never leave the places where they abide , but as soon as they leave them, both the continent and the adjacent islands are annoyed with great commotion , in the air darkness, thunder, hail, tremblings, pulsations, arietations of the earth , storms and hurricanes at sea , together with sad complaints amongst the people, broaching of religions, changes in governments, and ruins of commonwealths.”

Epistémon, who may, at this moment, be identified with Rabelais himself, then spoke and cited a recent and memorable instance in support of the belief to which Pantagruel inclines.

“ We had a sad instance of this lately,” said Epistémon, “ at the death of that valiant and learned knight, William du Bellay, during whose life France enjoy’d so much happiness, that all the rest of the world look’d upon it with envy, sought friendship with it, and stood in awe of its power ; but soon after his decease it hath for a considerable time been the scorn of the rest of the world ”

We have already had occasion to quote these words. As a matter of fact, Epistémon does not confirm as much as he pretends the opinion of the Macréons and Pantagruel concerning the death of demons and heroes. The veils which, according to him, were brought upon France by the death of Guillaume du Bellay in no way resemble an earthquake or the storm in which Panurge thought he would die. They were the necessary ills of a kingdom suddenly deprived of one of its greatest captains. Epistémon, or rather Rabelais, exaggerates perhaps (as we have already said), the services rendered to the kingdom by Guillaume du Bellay, who was succeeded by valiant captains and skilful negotiators. But Rabelais sided with the du Bellay family. He had gone to Piedmont with the brave and wise Guillaume, lord of Langey, who had not forgotten him in his will. He showed him a gratitude whose marks were destined to be immortal. As for these reveries over the souls of heroes which, when separated from the body, trouble the air and sow storms, they are taken from Plutarch, and the good Pantagruel, when he discusses them, is merely translating a passage from the treatise on Oracles That Have Ceased.

By way of conclusion, he declares his faith in the immortality of the soul .

“ I believe that all intellectual souls are exempted from Atropos’s scissers. They are all immortal, whether they be of angels, of dæmons, or human ”

Then, as he likes to tell stories, he tells the story of the Pilot Thamous, which, familiar as it is, cannot be passed over, because it is too beautiful and inspires a too-insatiable curiosity. It also is taken from the treatise on Oracles That Have Ceased Here it is, in the translation, which Jacques Amyot made of the Morals of Plutarch, a few years after the publication of the Fourth Book of Pantagruel The style is pleasant and easy, I shall make no change other than to correct a mistake for, I may say in passing, Amyot did not read and understand his text so well as Rabelais

“ Epitherses was my townsman and schoolmaster, who told me that designing a voyage to Italy, he embark’d himself on a vessel well laden both with goods and passengers About the evening the vessel was becalm’d about the Isles Echinades Whereupon their ship drove with the tide till it was carry’d near the Isles of Paxos . when immediately a voice was heard by most of the passengers (who were then awake and taking a cup after supper) calling unto one Thamus, and that with so loud a voice, as made all the company amazed , which Thamus was a mariner of Egypt, whose name was scarcely known in the ship He returned no answer to the first calls, but at the third he replied, Here ! here ! I am the man Then the Voice said aloud to him, when you are arrived at Palodes, take care to make it known, that the great God Pan is dead

Epitherses told us, this Voice did much astonish all that heard it, and caused much arguing, whether this Voice was to be obeyed or slighted. Thamus, for his part, was resolv'd, if the wind permitted, to sayl by the place without saying a word ; but if the wind ceas'd, and there ensu'd a calm, to spake and cry out as loud as he was able what he was enjoyn'd Being come to the Palodes, there was no wind stirring, and the sea was as smooth as glass. Whereupon Thamus standing on the deck, with his face towards the land, uttered with a loud voice his message, saying, The Great PAN is dead He had not sooner said this, but they heard a dreadful noise, not only of one but of several, who, to their thinking, groan'd, and lamented with a kind of astonishment And there being many persons in the ship, an account of this was soon spread over Rome, which made Tiberius the Emperor send for Thamus, and seem'd to give such heed to what he told him, that he earnestly inquired who this PAN was."

Here is the freer version of Rabelais .

" Epitherses the Father of Æmilian the rhetorician, sailing from Greece to Italy, in a ship freighted with divers goods and passengers, at night the wind fail'd 'em near the Echinades, some islands that lie between the Morea and Tunis, and the vessel was driven near Paxos When they were got thither, some of the passengers being asleep, others awake, the rest eating and drinking, a voice was heard that call'd aloud Thamous , which cry surpris'd them all. This same Thamous was their pilot, an Egyptian by birth, but known by name only to some few travellers The Voice was heard a second time calling Thamous, in a frightful

RABELAIS

Epitherses told us, this Voice did much astonish all that heard it, and caused much arguing, whether this Voice was to be obeyed or slighted. Here is the freer version of Rabelais

"Epitherses the Father of Æmilian the rhetorician, sailing from Greece to Italy, in a ship freighted with divers goods and passengers, at night the wind fail'd 'em near the Echinades, some islands that lie between the Morea and Tunis, and the vessel was driven near Paxos. When they were got thither, some of the passengers being asleep, others awake, the rest eating and drinking, a voice was heard that call'd aloud Thamous, which cry surpris'd them all. This same Thamous was their pilot, an Egyptian by birth, but known by name only to some few travellers. The Voice was heard a second time calling Thamous, in a frightful tone, and none making answer, but trembling and remaining silent, the Voice was heard a third time, more dreadful than before.

“ This caus’d Thamous to answer, ‘ Here am I, What do’st thou call me for? What wilt thou have me do?’ Then the Voice, louder than before, bade him publish, when he should come to Paloda, that the great god Pan was dead.

“ Epitherses related, that all the mariners and passengers, having heard this, were extremely amaz’d and frighted, and that consulting among themselves, whether they had best conceal or divulge what the Voice had enjoyn’d, Thamous said, his advice was, that if they happen’d to have a fair wind, they shou’d proceed, without mentioning a word on’t, but if they chanc’d to be becalm’d, he wou’d publish what he had heard. Now when they were near Paloda they had no wind, neither were they in any current. Thamous then getting up on the top of the ship’s fore-castle, and casting his eyes on the shore, said that he had been commanded to proclaim, that the great God Pan was dead. The words were hardly out of his mouth, when deep groans, great lamentation, and shrieks, not of one person, but of many together, were heard from the land.

“ The news of this (many being present then) was soon spread at Rome, insomuch that Tiberius, who was then Emperor, sent for this Thamous, and having heard him, gave credit to his words.”

Plutarch, like Rabelais, the Alexandrian as well as the humanist, believed that Pàn, the great god Pan, was All, the great All, παν in Greek means All. It is easy to imagine what mysterious terror was spread by this voice hurled over the sea . “ The great god Pan is dead ” This etymology, nevertheless, is very false and even absurd. Pan was born with horns, a beard, a snub nose and goat’s feet. He dwelt in Arcadia, living in the woods and fields and guarding his flocks , he invented the pipes on which he made rustic music This little god sometimes inspired terror in men by his sudden apparition Such being his appearance and his habits, his name must rather be derived from the verb παύω, which means to pasture, since he pastured sheep, and it is probable that such is its first and real meaning As for his becoming the symbol of the universe, that is an accident which happened to this demi-man because of a fortuitous resemblance of sounds Poets very often think in puns and word play, and many men are poets in that respect

As he did not doubt that the great god Pan was the great All, Pantagruel could not help thinking that this great All is God made man and that the words heard by Thamous announced the death of Jesus Christ

“ I understand it,” he said, “ of that great Saviour of the faithful, who was shamefully put to death at Jerusalem, by the envy and wickedness of the doctors, priests and monks of the Mosaic Law. He may lawfully be said,” the gentle giant added, “ to be Pan in the Greek tongue, since he is our All. For all that we are, all that we live, all that we have, all that we hope, is Him, by Him, from Him and in Him , He is the good Pan, the Great Shepherd, who hath not only a tender love and affection for his sheep but also for their shepherds At his death, complaints, sighs, fears and lamentations were spread through the whole fabrick of the universe, whether Heaven, land, sea or Hell ”

According to our veracious author, as he spoke in this way, Pantagruel shed tears as large as ostriches’ eggs. The interpretation which he gives of Plutarch’s story is not entirely his own · it was to be found in Eusebius ; it was abandoned when the critical and historical spirit, breathing over the Christian origins, dissipated the fables Then the view was that the apocalypse of the Egyptian pilot was a symbol of the death of the gods of antiquity

“ The great god Pan is dead,” that means to modern poets and philosophers that the Old World has collapsed and on its ruins a New World rises The old altars are deserted, a new god is born

It is thus that Paul Arène, Provençal poet, of the purest and most delicate talent, has interpreted the old myth of Plutarch, in a poem entitled, Christmas at Sea.

I think we may well quote it, after Plutarch and Rabelais, as an example of the rejuvenation of an ancient theme and of the eternal vitality of legends It should be heard from the lips of that consummate artist in the speaking of verse, Sylvian, of the Comédie Française, who recites this poem admirably I shall quote only the first lines which deal with my subject.

Lorsque le vieux Thamus, pâle et rasant le bord,
A la place prescrite eut crié “ Pan est mort ! ”
Le rivage s’émut, et, sur les flots tranquilles,

RABELAIS

On entendit les airs gémir, pleurer des voix,
Comme si, sur les monts sauvages, dans les bois
Impénétrés, les dieux, aux souffles d'Ionie,
Les dieux, près de mourir, disaient leur agonie
Le soleil se voila de jets de sable amer
Un âpre vent fouetta les vagues de la mer,
Et l'on vit, soufflant l'eau de leurs glauques narines,
Les phoques de Protee et ses vaches marines
S'échouer, monstrueux, et pareils à des monts,
Sur l'écueil blanc d'écume et noir de goémons
Puis, tandis que Thamus, le vieux patron de barque, Serrait le gouvernail et jurait par la Parque,
Un silence se fit et le flot se calma
Or, le mousse avait pu grimper en haut du mât
Et, tenant à deux mains la voile et l'antenne .
—Père ! s'écria-t-il tout a coup, capitaine !
Père ! un vol de démons ailés et familiers
Vient sur la mer, dans le soleil, et par milliers,
Si près de nous que leur essaim frôle les planches
De la barque ! Je les vois passer, formes blanches
Ils chantent comme font les oiseaux dans les champs ,
Leur langue est inconnue et je comprends leurs chants
Ils chantent Hosanna ! Les entendez-vous, père ?
Ils disent que le monde a fini sa misère,
Et que tout va fleurir Père, ils disent encore
Que les hommes vont voir un nouvel âge d'or !
Un dieu nous le promet, un enfant dont les langes
N'ont ni dessins brodés à Tyr, ni larges franges
Pourpres, et qui vagit dans la paille et le foin
Quel peut être, pour qu'on l'annonce de si loin,

—Les démons ont dit vrai, mon fils Depuis le temps Que Jupiter jaloux foudroya les Titans,
 Et que l'Etna mugit, crachant du soufre,
 L'homme est abandonné sur terre, l'homme souffre,
 Penant toujours, gelé l'hiver, brûle l'été,
 Sans te vaincre jamais, ô maigre pauvreté !
 Doit donner à chacun de nous sa juste part
 Les dieux sont bons parfois, mon fils, quand ils sont jeûnes

There is the myth of old Thamous interpreted by a modern poet. M. Salomon Reinach, in his Orpheus, has recently given a more literal and more exact explanation of it, by connecting it with the festivals of Adonis Adonis, beloved of Aphrodite, was killed by a wild boar while hunting, and mourned by his mistress Every year, on the anniversary of his death, the women of Byblos mourned the young god and in their lamentations called him by his sacred name, Thamous, which was never uttered save in these mournful mysteries This cult and these rites spread all over Greece While they were going along the coast of Epirus, the Greek passengers on an Egyptian boat, whose pilot's name happened to be Thamous, heard the cry during the night .
 Θαμοῦς, Θαμοῦς, Ουμοῦς πανμέγας τέθνηκε, that is, Thamous, the very great, is dead The pilot thought that he was being called and that thus was being announced the death of great Pan, Πᾶν μέγας. That is the end of the legend, at least it ends gracefully in a chorus of weeping women and amongst the lamentations of those taking part in the mysteries

I have lingered long over the Macréons. But the country, the stories, the ideas, the images—everything has a singular attractiveness and a rare beauty. In the description of this melancholy island and its sacred wood, all is grave, religious, heroic. We can imagine it as something like that island of black pines, bathed by the waters of Corfu, which Boecklin has painted with such grandeur, such sadness, and such mystery.

Pantagruel and his companions continue their journey in search of the Oracle of the Bottle. Scarcely had the island of the Macréons disappeared from view than the Sneaking-island hove in sight. It is a miserable island inhabited by Shrovetide, that is to say, by Lent in person. Rabelais, who in religion never encroaches upon dogma, is a great reformer, on the contrary, in matters of ecclesiastical discipline. He personifies Lent as an odious and ridiculous monster, a fish-eater, a dictator of mustard, foster-father to physicians, a good Catholic, for the rest, and of great piety, weeping three-quarters of the day and never assisting at any weddings.

Rabelais makes Xenomanes describe the anatomy of Shrovetide. The passage is very long, and for a long time it remained unintelligible. It must be admitted that it is difficult to understand a text such as this:

Quite recently a learned physiologist and compatriot of Rabelais, Dr. Ledouble, discovered a meaning in these comparisons. It appears that Master François shows a great knowledge of anatomy I can well believe it. They are the jokes of a man of science, but they are a bore

On leaving the Sneaking-island, as they came near the Wild Island, the navigators encountered an enormous whale. As a good humanist, who likes to use Greek and Latin, Rabelais calls it a physetere. Pantagruel harpoons the animal, and the author describes whale-fishing with his customary exactness, like a man who knows the technique of the arts, crafts and industries. People have wondered what symbol is concealed beneath this maritime episode, and whether the opponent of Lent did not wish to kill the canonical fast with this cetaceous monster. This is rather far-fetched. As M. Abel Lefranc remarks, "A fishing incident of this kind was almost obligatory in the course of a journey in North American waters, where every year at this time, the fishermen of the Bay of St. Brieuc, of La Rochelle, of Olonne, of St. Jean de Luz, and Ciboure went to hunt the whale, which was already rare in those parts of the ocean which were closer to Europe."

But, after all, we are at liberty to see in this physetere anything we please. It is one of the great charms of the book which we have been analysing, that it means different things to different minds, according to their curiosity and their genius. The Wild Island is inhabited by Chutterlings. Compared with the island of Shrovetide, it is plenty contrasted with fasting, or perhaps the Calvinists opposed to the Papists. The fact that they are terrible leads one to believe that these Chutterlings are Calvinists. Panurge was terrified by them. Friar John, at the head of the cooks, charged them impetuously and ran them through with his spit.

What does that mean? Is Rabelais so ill disposed towards the Reformers? Not so long ago he seemed to lean in their direction. The matter must be examined more closely. He did not dislike the Reformers of France, he execrated the Reformers of Geneva, the demoniac Calvins, who felt no less strongly about him. The Chitterlings, whose massacre and extermination he so joyfully relates, are apparently Chitterlings from Geneva. If they had been from Troyes, he would have pitied them and would not have permitted such carnage.

However, we must beware of attributing a too symbolical meaning to the adventures of Captains Mawl-Chitterling, and Cut-Pudding, and Niphleseth, queen of the Chitterlings, and of the inhabitants of Ruach, who live only on wind, and of the giant, Widenostrils, who fed on windmills, and who choked to death eating a lump of fresh butter at the mouth of a hot oven, by the advice of his physicians.

But when we reach the Island of Popefigs and learn that the inhabitants of this country escaped from the yoke of the Papimen only to fall under that of the feudal lords, we cannot help thinking of the German Church, which Luther snatched from the rapacity of the Roman Pontiffs only to subject it to the authority of the German princes. Here the allusion meets us halfway, with its veil half raised.

The Island of Popefigs, in the Gallic tradition, is most celebrated for its little Devil who could not yet hail and thunder, unless it were on parsley and cabbage, and being very innocent could neither read nor write.

Seeing a labourer in his field, he asked him what he was doing
The poor man replied that he was sowing his field with corn to help him to subsist the next year

“ Ay,” said the little devil, “ but the ground is none of thine,
Mr. Plough-jobber, but mine ”

In effect, ever since the inhabitants of Popefig land had offended
the Pope, their entire country had been consigned to the devils

“ However,” the little devil continued, “ to sow corn is not my province , therefore I will give thee leave to sow the field ; that is to say, provided we share the profit ”

“ I will,” reply’d the farmer

two lots shall be made, one of what shall grow above ground, the other of what shall be cover’d with earth , the right of chusing belongs to me, for I am a devil of noble and ancient race , thou art a base clown I therefore chuse what shall lye underground, take thou what shall be above When dost thou reckon to reap, hah ? ”

“ About the middle of July,” quoth the farmer.

“ Well,” said the devil, “ I’ll not fail thee then in the meantime, slave as thou oughtest Work, clown, work I am going to tempt noble nuns, I am more than sure of these ”

When the middle of July came, the devil appeared at the cornfield, accompanied by a squadron of little imps There, meeting the farmer, he said to him “ Well, clod-pate, how hast thou done since I went? Thou and I must now share the concern.”

Then the farmer and his men began to cut the corn At the same time, the little imps pulled out the stubble The farmer thrashed his corn, winnowed it, put it into sacks and went to the market to sell it. The imps did the same and sat down in the market beside the farmer to sell their straw The farmer sold his corn for a good price and filled an old demi-buskin, which was fastened to his girdle with the money The devils sold nothing, but, on the contrary, the peasants jeered at them in the open market place. When the market was over, the devils said to the farmer .

“ Nay, good sir devil,” reply’d the farmer, “ how can I be said to have chous’d you, since ’twas your worship that chose first The truth is that by this trick you thought to cheat me, hoping that nothing would spring out of the earth for my share, and that you should find whole underground the corn which I had sow’d . . . but troth, you must e’en go to school yet, you are no conjuror, for aught I see , for, the corn that was sow’d is dead and rotten, its corruption having caus’d the generation of that which you saw me sell so you chose the worst, and therefore are curs’d in the Gospel ”

“ Now,” cry’d the devil, “ thou talkst like an honest fellow, bumpkin. Well, sow me a good store of raddish, I’ll see and keep them safe from storms, and will not hail a bit on them , but harke'e me, this time, I bespeak for my share what shall be above ground, what's under shall be thine drudge on, looby, drudge on I am going to tempt hereticks, their souls are dainty victuals when broil'd in rashers and well powder'd ”

When harvest time arrived, the devil went to the radish field with his imps who began to cut and gather the radish-leaves After him the farmer dug, pulled up the big radishes and put them in bags Then they all went off together to the market The farmer sold his radishes very well, the devil sold nothing. What is worse, people publicly jeered at him

It is hardly necessary to say that Rabelais did not invent this story Rabelais took it from popular tradition La Fontaine took it from Rabelais and put it into verse Here is the story as the poet wrote it in an excellent style.

Papefigue se nomme

L'île et province ou les gens autrefois
Firent la figue au portrait du Saint-Père
Punis en sont , rien chez eux ne prospère
Ainsi nous l'a conté maître François
L'île fut lors donnée en apanage
A Lucifer , c'est sa maison des champs
On voit courir par tout cet heritage
Ses commensaux, rudes et pauvres gens,
Peuple ayant queue, ayant cornes et griffes,
Si maints tableaux ne sont point apocryphes

Advint un jour qu'un de ces beaux messieurs
 Vit un manant rusé, des plus trompeurs,
 Verser un champ dans l'île dessus dite
 Bien paraissait la terre être maudite,
 Car le manant avec peine et sueur
 La retournait et faisait son labeur
 Survint un diable à titre de seigneur
 Ce diable était des gens de l'Évangile,
 Simple, ignorant, à tromper très facile,
 Bon gentilhomme et qui, dans son courroux,
 N'avait encore tonné que sur les choux
 Plus ne savait apporter de dommage
 — Vilain, dit-il, vaquer à nul ouvrage,
 N'est mon talent . je suis un diable issu
 De noble race, et qui n'a jamais su
 Se tourmenter ainsi que font les autres
 Tu sais, vilain, que tous ces champs sont nôtres ,
 Ils sont à nous dévolus par l'édit.
 Qui mit jadis cette île en interdit
 Voux y vivez dessous notre police
 Partant, vilain, je puis avec justice
 M'attribuer tout le fruit de ce champ ,
 Mais je suis bon, et veux que dans un an
 Nous partagions sans noise et sans querelle
 Quel grain veux tu repandre dans ces lieux ?
 Le manant dit — Monseigneur, pour le mieux
 Je crois qu'il faut les couvrir de touzelle ,
 Car c'est un grain qui vient fort aisement
 — Je ne connais ce grain-là nullement,
 Dit le lutin, Comment dis-tu ?      Touzelle ?
 Memme n'ai d'un grain qui s'appelle
 De cette sorte , or, emplis-en ce lieu ,

Touzelle, soit, Touzelle, de par Dieu !
 J'en suis content Fais donc vite et travaille ;
 Manant, travaille ! et travaille, vilain !
 Travailler est le fut de la canaille :
 Ne t'attends pas que je t'aide un seul brin,
 Ni que par moi ton labeur se consume ,
 Je t'ai dit que j'étais gentilhomme,
 Ne pour chomer et pour ne rien savoir.
 Voici comment ira notre partage
 Deux lots seront, dont l'un c'est à savoir
 Ce qui hors terre et de sus l'héritage
 Aura poussé, demeurera pour toi ,
 L'autre, dans terre, est réserve pour moi
 L'août arrive, la touzelle est seiche,
 Et, tout d'un temps, sa racine arrachée
 Pour satisfaire au lot du diableteau
 Il y croyait la semence attachée,
 Et que l'épi, non plus que le tuyau,
 N'était qu'une herbe inutile et séchée.
 Le laboureur vous la serra très bien
 L'autre au marché porta son chaume vendre
 On le hua , pas un n'en offrit rien ,
 Le pauvre diable était prêt à se pendre.
 Il s'en alla chez son copartageant
 Le drôle avait le touzelle vendue,
 Pour le plus sûr, en gerbe et non battue,
 Ne manquant pas de bien cacher l'argent
 Bien le cacha Le diable en fut la dupe
 —Coquin, dit-il, tu m'as joué d'un tour
 C'est ton métier Je suis diable de cour
 Qui, comme vous, a tromper ne m'occupe

RABELAIS

Le manant dit —Je crois qu'au lieu de grain
Planter me faut ou navets ou carottes
Vous en aurez, monseigneur, plaines hottes,
Si mieux n'aimez rêves dans la saison
—Rêves, navets, carottes, tout est bon,
Dit le lutin Mon lot sera hors terre ,
Le tien dedans Je ne veux point de guerre
Avec que toi, si tu ne m'y contrains
Je vais tenter quelques jeunes nonnains
L'auteur ne dit ce qui firent les nonnes
Le temps venu de recueillir encore,
Le manant prend rêves belles et bonnes,
Feuilles sans plus tombent pour tout trésor
Au diableteau qui, l'épaule chargée,
Court au marché Grande fut la risée ,
Chacun lui dit son mot, cette fois-là
—Monsieur le diable, où croît cette denrée ?
Où mettez-vous ce qu'on en donnera ?

With what fidelity La Fontaine, the best linguist of his century, reproduces the forms of language, the turns of phrase, the vocabulary of his model !

However, let us continue our journey in search of the Oracle
After the Island of Popefigs, Pantagruel and his companions reach the Island of Papimany

“ Have you seen him ? ” the inhabitants cried at once. “ Have you seen him ? ”

Seeing that they meant the Pope, Panurge replied that he had seen three of them, and had derived little profit from the sight

“How ?” cried the Papimen “Our sacred decretals inform us that there never is more than one living”

“I mean, successively, one after the other,” return’d Panurge ;
“otherwise I never saw more than one at a time”

Here it is Rabelais who is speaking in the name of that rascal Panurge. In effect, at the time when he was writing the Fourth Book, Rabelais had seen three popes · Clément VII, Paul III, and Julius III.

The entire population of the country, men, women, little children, having come to meet them in a procession, raised their hands to Heaven and cried :

Homenas, the Bishop of Papimany, kissed their feet.

This prelate, having invited them to dinner, the repast, rich in capons, hogs, pigeons, leverets, turkeys, etc , was served by young lasses, fair, good conditioned, blonde, soft, comely, dressed in white robes with a double girdle, their heads bare, their hair knotted with tapes and ribbons of violet silk, stuck with roses, gilly-flowers, and marjoram, who invited the guests to drink with neat and gentle courtesies.

In this the good man Homenas was merely following the custom of the Valois, who, instead of the usual service by pages, substituted at their table the service of young and beautiful girls. Homenas, in the midst of this magnificent feast, sang the praises of the sacred decretals, which, he said, if they were obeyed, would effect the happiness of the human race and begin an era of universal happiness.

The decretals, as we know, are the letters in which the Pope, by solving a question submitted to him, gives a solution concerning a particular instance which is applicable to all analogous cases. Sometimes false ones were produced in order to create favourable precedents

It is not for nothing that Rabelais conducts his readers to a Papaman who is mad upon the subject of decretals. He seizes the opportunity to mock abundantly, and with an acrimoniousness unusual in him, these texts, real or false, upon which the Sovereign Pontiff pretended to establish his rights over peoples and princes. He puts plenty of jokes at the expense of these holy epistles in the mouth of Pantagruel's companions. Ponocrates relates how Jean Chouart of Montpellier took a leaf of decretals to beat his gold and all his pieces were spoiled.

At Mans, said Eudemon, François Cornu, an apothecary, had made paper bags with those decretals which are called extravagantes, that is to say, scattered, and everything he wrapped up in them was immediately poisoned, corrupted and spoiled.

In Paris, said Carpalin, a tailor named Groignet had used some old decretals for patterns. All the clothes cut on these patterns were lost.

The two sisters of Rhizotome, Catherine and Renée, having put some collarettes freshly washed, finely starched and white, in a volume of decretals, took them out again, blacker than a bag of coal.

bad, against the decretals), replied . “ I understand you , this is one of the quirks and little satyres of the new-fangled here-ticks ”

That is going too far Rabelais was undoubtedly in favour of the reform of the Church, but he was neither a schismatic nor a heretic He had not enough faith to sin against the faith. My own belief is that he believed nothing But here it is not a question of his private thoughts it is a question of his doctrine He was with the bishops and prelates of France against the Sorbonne and the monks , he was a Gallican , he was a zealous defender of the rights of the Church and of the Crown of France , he was against the Pope and in favour of the most Christian King At bottom, his chief reproach against the Roman policy, as expressed in the decretals, was that it usurped the temporal power of the kings , that it drew the gold of France to Rome With dogma he has no concern and showed himself to be as accommodating as possible in this connection He was never concerned in any way about the Mass and the Sacraments On the contrary, what he had at heart was the interests of the kingdom and its sovereign We must remember the ancient quarrel between the Kings of France and the Popes It fills the history of the eldest daughter of the Church Rabelais was heart and soul for his country, for his prince , that is his politics, that is his theology

Having left the island of Papimany, Pantagruel and his companions, on the lonely confines of the Frozen Sea, suddenly heard the sound of voices, the noise of a crowd of people, and distinguished syllables and words , and these words in the desert of waters caused some surprise and some flight among them.

The pilot reassured them :

“ About the beginning of last winter happen’d a great and bloody fight. Then the words and cries of men and women, the neighing of horses, and all other martial din froze in the air. and now the rigour of the winter being over by the succeeding serenity and warmth of the weather, they melt and are heard.”

We are approaching the end of the Fourth Book

Pantagruel stayed at the manor of Messer Gaster, the stomach in person, first master of the arts of the world. An allegorical journey, if ever there was one, and one which supplied an excellent theme to the abundant wisdom of Rabelais. The incomparable author shows us how Messer Gaster is the father of the arts.

“ Accordingly, from the beginning he invented the Smith’s art and husbandry to manure the ground that it might yield him corn ; he invented arms, and the art of war to defend corn, physick and astronomy, with other parts of mathematicks, which might be useful to keep corn a great number of years in safety from the injuries of the air, beasts, robbers and purloiners, he invented water, wind and hand-mills, and a thousand other engines to grind corn, and turn it into meal, leaven to make the dough ferment, and the use of salt to give it a savour, for he knew that nothing bred more diseases than heavy, unleaven’d, unsavoury bread.

“ He found a way to get fire to bake it, hour-glasses, dials and clocks to mark the time of its baking ; and as some countries wanted corn, he contriv'd means to convey some out of one country into another

“ He had the wit to pimp for asses and mares, animals of different species, that they might copulate for the generation of a third, which we call mules, more strong and fit for hard service than the other two. He invented carts and waggons to draw him along with greater ease ; and as seas and rivers hindered his progress, he devis'd boats, gallies and ships (to the astonishment of the elements) to waft him over to barbarous, unknown, and far distant nations, thence to bring, or thither to carry corn ”

Ah ! if he were to return to the world to-day, if he were in our midst, what new and marvellous inventions old Master François would have to add to the ancient arts of Messer Gaster ! Steam transportation, the market rates known instantaneously by telegraph all over the globe, the preservation of meat by freezing, chemical manures, intensive cultivation, methodical selection, American vines being used to revive the exhausted old stocks of ancient Europe, the Bacchus of the new world giving life to our Latin Bacchus, and all the other marvels of man whose urgent needs render him ingenious

After the manor of Messer Gaster, when we have pointed out the island of Chaneph inhabited by hypocrites, holy mountebanks, hermits, sham saints, all of them poor wretches living on the alms given them by travellers, we shall have covered all of the journey of Pantagruel in search of the Oracle of the Bottle, which François Rabelais published in his lifetime

RABELAIS

The good Rabelais has pointed out to us with his gigantic finger : there is the first cause of your energies, of your great social qualities. It is Messer Gaster, the first master of arts in the world, who has taught you the rapid exploitation of the wealth of your soil, inspired your commercial activity, caused your economic and financial progress.

CHAPTER VIII

THE Sorbonne censored the Fourth Book and publication was stopped by a decree of Parliament, dated 1st March, 1552, stating that, "Whereas the Faculty of Theology has censored a certain evil work, offered for sale under the title of The Fourth Book of Pantagruel, with the King's privilege, the Court orders that the bookseller shall be immediately brought hither and that he shall be forbidden to sell or show the said book within a period of fourteen days during which time the Court orders the King's Proctor to inform his Majesty aforesaid of the condemnation pronounced upon the said book by the said Faculty of Theology, and to send him a copy thereof to be dealt with at his pleasure"

The printer, Michel Fezandat, having been summoned to court, was forbidden to sell the work for fourteen days on penalty of corporal punishment. After an interval, which cannot be determined, the suspension was withdrawn.

In November 1552, there was a rumour that Rabelais had been thrown into prison and was in chains. The rumour was false. The author of Pantagruel was at liberty, but he was approaching his end. The date and place of his death are unknown. His epitaph, composed by Tahureau, gives us reason to believe that he was surrounded by friends during his last moments and that he joked at their grief.

Colletet says that he died at Paris in a house in the Rue des Jardins, and that he was buried in the cemetery of St Paul, under a large tree which was still pointed out in the seventeenth century.

At that time, poets and humanists used to like to compose epitaphs on the illustrious dead. Ronsard consecrated an epitaph to Rabelais, in the form of an ode, in which he is chiefly celebrated as a drinker :

 Tant fût-il matin, qu'il n'eût bu,
 Et jamais au soir la nuit noire,
 Tant fût tard, ne l'a vu sans boire
 Il chantant la grande massue
 Et la jument de Gargantue,
 Le grand Panurge et le pays Des Papimanes ébahis,
 Leurs lois, leurs façons, leurs demeures,
 Et frère Jean des Entommeures
 Et d'Epistémon les combats.
 O toi, quiconque sois, qui passes,
 Sur sa fosse répands des tasses,
 Répands du bril et des flacons,
 Des cervelas et des jambons

At the first glance, our modern delicacy is inclined to find these lines insulting, and we should not have expected that the prince of poets would speak thus of the incomparable master. But on closer observation we see that this epitaph is an imitation of several little poems in the Greek Anthology, consecrated to the memory of Anacreon. In the mind of Ronsard, that is an honour for Rabelais.

Another poet of the Pleiad, Baïf, composed a funeral epigram for Rabelais which is not without grace .

O Pluton, Rabelais reçoi,
Afin que toi qui es le roi
De ceux qui ne rient jamais
Tu ais un rieur désormais

But I shall be more pleased to quote a very beautiful epitaph in Latin verse which Pierre Boulanger, who was a doctor and had known Rabelais, composed in honour of the author of Pantagruel. The following is a literal translation .

“ Beneath this stone sleeps the most excellent of laughing men. Our descendants will seek out the kind of man he was, for all who lived in his time well know who he was , every one knew him, and more than any other, he was dear to all Perhaps they will believe that he was a buffoon, a clown, who by dint of his jokes earned a good meal No, no, he was not a buffoon, nor a public clown But, with his exquisite and penetrating genius, he mocked at the human race, at its insensate desires and the credulity of its hopes. Undisturbed about his fate, he led a happy life ; the winds always blew in his favour. Yet, no more learned man could be found when, forgetting his jokes, he was pleased to talk seriously and to play a serious part Never did any Senator, with threatening brow and severe and melancholy glance, sit more seriously upon his lofty seat. A large and difficult question had only to be propounded and to require great skill and knowledge for its solution and one would have thought that large subjects were open to him alone and to him only were the secrets of nature revealed. With what eloquence he could adorn whatever he was pleased to say, to the admiration of all whom his biting pleasantries and his usual witticisms had led to believe that this joker was nothing of a scholar ! He knew everything that Greece and Rome had produced, but, like a new Democritus, he laughed at the vain fears and the desires of the common people and of princes, at their frivolous cares and at the anxious labours of this brief life in which is consumed all the time which a benevolent divinity is willing to grant us ”

Rabelais, as we have seen, died leaving his Pantagruel incomplete Nine years after his death appeared a fragment of the Fifth and last Book, making sixteen chapters. The entire book was published in 1564 without the name of the bookseller or the place of publication

It has been denied that Rabelais was its author Many people, struck by the Calvinist tendencies found in this work, do not recognise the author whom Calvin regarded as an atheist, and who regarded Calvin as demoniac But the Calvinism of the Fifth Book is practically limited to attacks on monks, and Rabelais always mocked those poor hooded creatures Like Lenormant, I think I can recognise here and there in these pages the lion's claw

That is not to say that we are certain of possessing in its entirety the actual text of Rabelais It is probable that the author had not put the finishing touches to his work. There were lacunæ, obscurities The editor explained and completed, as the case required, and sometimes perhaps when there was no necessity, in order to make improvements and show his talent The editors of that time did not understand their duties as do those of our time They did not feel bound to be faithful and tried to embellish the work which they were issuing All the posthumous works of the sixteenth century give evidence of this infidelity. It is not surprising that such evidence can be found in the Fifth Book, as it has come down to us A thing that is, I confess, rather disturbing, is the quatrain which the anonymous editor placed at the beginning, and which is as follows ·

Is Rabelais dead ? A Book see yet again !
His better part with life is still aglow,
Another of his writings to bestow,
Which make him live immortal among Men

So far as I can understand it this means Rabelais is dead, but he recovered consciousness in order to present us with this book It must be admitted that a pastiche would not be differently announced But we must take into account the unskilfulness of a bad rhymmer, and it might mean . Rabelais is not dead, since he lives again in this book By prolonging this debate we merely succeed in accumulating doubts Let us face the enigmatic work.

THE FIFTH BOOK

CHAPTER IX

THE FIFTH BOOK

THIS posthumous Book relates the continuation and end of the journey of Pantagruel and his companions in search of the Oracle of the Holy Bottle I shall not examine it in such detail as the others because, while I believe it to be, in the main, the work of Rabelais, we cannot be certain that all of it is his Furthermore, a considerable part is occupied by allegories, which rendered lifeless so many chapters of the Fourth Book, and which make it dull and dreary, while the tone grows sharper, and the attacks on the hobgoblins and the Furr'd Lawcats become more violent than in anything that the author himself gave to the public

The travellers first land on Ringing Island, where bells are heard perpetually. Rabelais could not tolerate the sound of bells, and the dark picture of this country would seem to be authentically his. The Island is inhabited by caged birds of clerical origin as their names indicate : clerghawks, monkhawks, priest-hawks, abbothawks, bishhawks, cardinhawks, one popehawk, who is a species by himself, clerkkites, nunkites, priestkites, abbesskites, bishkites, cardinkites, popekites These birds are not indigenous to the Island, but come from outside Some were sent there while young by their mothers, who could not bear to have them at home The majority came from Breadless Day, which is very long. This amounts to saying that the cruel selfishness of parents and the poverty of large families people convents.

It was here that Panurge told the story of the Horse and the Ass. It is worthy of Rabelais, but I must refer to the text those readers who are not frightened by the greater freedom of the old tongue.

The travellers next arrived at the Island of Tools. The trees there bear tools and arms instead of fruit · pickaxes, hoes, scythes, sickles, spades, trowels, hatchets, bill-hooks, saws, adzes, shears, pincers, daggers and poniards When a tool or an arm is required, the tree is shaken and these iron fruits fall, fitting into the handles and scabbards growing below. Each reader will interpret this myth according to taste.

Then we are taken to the Island of Sharping, that is, to the Island of Deceit, of Mockery. There, amongst other peculiarities, are square rocks about which greater destruction, greater losses in lives and property had occurred than about all the Syrtes, Syllas, Charybdes, Sirens and gulfs in the universe. These square rocks are dice Here, like a good Catholic preacher, Rabelais is protesting against games of chance.

On the Island of Sharping we encounter people of a type which is not extinct dealers in faked antiques. One of them sold the Pantagruelists a piece of the shell of the two eggs laid by Leda. At the same time, relic-showmen, for a consideration, allowed them to touch a feather from the wings of the Archangel Gabriel.

The Pantagruelian ships then put in at the Island of Condemnation, the seat of the criminal courts. The judges who administer it are the Furr'd Law-cats They have the hair and claws of cats. This is the author's description of them .

“ They hang all, burn all, draw all, quarter all, behead all, murder all, imprison all, ruin all, and waste all For among them Vice is call'd Virtue , Wickedness, Piety ; Treason, Loyalty ; Robbery, Justice , Plunder is their motto. Their wickedness is no more known in the world'than the Cabala of the Jews, and therefore 'tis not detested, chastis'd, and punish'd, as 'tis fit it shou'd be But shou'd all their villainy be once displayed in its true colours, and expos'd to the people, there never was, is, nor will be any spokesman so sweet-mouth'd, whose fine colloquing tongue could save 'em , nor any laws so rigorous and Draconic, that could punish 'em as they deserve , nor yet any magistrate so powerful as to hinder their being burnt alive in their coney-boroughs ”

The Island of Apedefers, where they next disembark, is the Island of Ignoramuses. The Apedefers are occupied solely in putting into wine-presses houses, meadows, fields, in order to squeeze money out of them, only part of which went to the King. The rest disappeared.

Next we come to the Island of For-ward Folks Our ancestors doubtless enjoyed, as they might a picture by Breughel, these descriptions of fat people who, after gorging, burst their skins with a horrible noise. Nowadays we like them only out of friendship for the past and as an archæological fantasy.

Having steered forward (the pun is in the text and is none the better on that account), we reach the realm of Quintessence, where the inhabitants are ingenious and subtle. Some make Blackamoors white by rubbing their bellies with the bottom of a pannier Others plough their fields with a yoke of foxes Others cut fire with a knife, others keep water in a sieve. There are those who measure the hop of a flea and those who guard the moon from the wolves.

However, these clever people could give no news of the Oracle to the Pantagruehians, who continued their journey and landed on the Island of Odes, where the ways walk On this Island the roads move of themselves and walk like animals.

“ Whither do's that way go ? ”

They answer :

“ To the parish, the city, the river ”

Just as everywhere else, but in Odes the reply is literal. The travellers take the right road and, without further effort or fatigue, are taken to their destination.

From this it has been concluded that Rabelais foresaw the escalator at the Exhibition in 1900. But, obviously, the author is joking, and playing upon the current expression, that a road goes from such-and-such a place to such-and-such a place.

What is more worthy of notice in this chapter, is the following passage

“Reflecting on the different manner of going of these moving ways, Seleucus became of the opinion in this Island that the earth turns round about its poles, and not the heavens, whatever we may think to the contrary, as when we are on the River Loire, we think the trees on the bank move. However, they do not move, but we do, by the floating down of the boat.”

The system of Seleucus is that which Copernicus expounded in 1543. Rabelais declares that the earth turns on its poles, in his time this was novel and daring. More than a century later Pascal was not so well informed, and up to the end of the eighteenth century in France the handbooks of cosmography for use in schools taught the system of Ptolemy, giving that of Copernicus as a pure hypothesis. Even to-day, in the twentieth century, we cannot assume that the asinine herd, the mob, is so well informed in such matters. In France quite recently a misunderstood proposition of the great mathematician Poincaré was sufficient for a crowd of literate ignoramuses (the species flourishes) to situate the earth at the centre of the world, a great subject of human pride. However, let us continue the journey.

After leaving the Island of Odes, we arrive at the Island of Sandals, where there is a monastery of very humble monks who call themselves the Semiquaver Friars, because they incessantly trill psalms On seeing these monks, Friar John exclaimed :

“ Now I know that this is our very Antipodes. In Germany they pull down monasteries and unfrockify the monks , here they act clean contrary to others, setting new ones up.”

This might well seem to be a favourable allusion to Luther's Reformation. In all his writings Rabelais never fails to point out that monks are unfortunate, useless and injurious He makes great fun of them but, as a matter of fact, he does not hate them, save when they behave like hobgoblins, cruelly persecute those who study Greek, and want to have people burned because of their learning and intelligence. When he accuses the poor monks of being too fond of the kitchen, he does it more in good humour than in anger. It must be remembered that, of all the characters in his universal comedy, the person whom he has endowed with the most courage, kindness, and active virtue is a monk, and not a renegade monk, a defrocked monk, but a real monk, “ a right monk,” as he says, “ if ever there was any since the monking world monked a monkerie ” When he founds a social institution into which he puts all his intelligence and all his heart, it is still an abbey, an abbey where the rules are in conformity with nature, where people love life, where they think less about heaven than about this world, but an abbey none the less, and a conventual dwelling.

The good Pantagruelists' last port of call is the Land of Satin, where the trees and flowers are of velvet and damask, and the animals and birds are of tapestry. They do not eat, sing or bite

On this island the travellers saw a little old hunchback, deformed and monstrous, whose name was Hear-say. His mouth was slit up to his ears, and in his mouth were seven tongues, each of them cleft into seven parts. All seven spoke together. He had as many ears on his head and the rest of his body as Argus had eyes.

"About him," the author adds, "stood an innumerable number of men and women, gaping, list'ning, and hearing very intently. Among 'em I observed a very handsome bodied man, who held then a map of the world, and with little aphorisms compendiously explain'd everything to 'em; so that those men of happy memories grew learned in a trice and would most fluently talk with you of a world of prodigious things; the hundredth part of which would take up a man's whole life to be fully known, of the Pyramids, of the Nile, of Babylon, of the Troglodytes, the Pygmies, the Cannibals, of all the devils: every individual word of it by hear-say. There I saw Herodotus, Pliny, Solinus, Berosus, Philostratus, Mela, Strabo, and God knows how many other antiquaries, Albert the Great, Paulus Jovius, Jemmy Cartier, Marco Paulo, and forty cart-loads of other modern historians, scribbling the Lord knows what, and all by hear-say."

This passage offers food for thought. Rabelais, if indeed the text is entirely his (for in this Fifth Book every detail is suspect), places Jacques Cartier, the King's pilot, amongst the writers of fables. This is rather in contradiction with the system which makes the Pantagruelian voyages a species of literary variation on a geographical theme of the St. Malo explorer. Rabelais seems to say that everything in Jacques Cartier's stories is not true. But what is most unusual, to any one who knows the spirit of the Renaissance, is to see a humanist, a Hellenist, a Latinist, like Rabelais, throw doubts upon the historical authority of Philostratus, Strabo, Herodotus, and Pliny, to hear a learned—and very learned—person, like Rabelais, making fun of the illustrious ancients, and alleging that they talk by hearsay, like a Marco Polo, a Paulus Jovius, or any other modern. This is so contrary to the usual attitude of the scholars of the period, it is so peculiar, that it justifies the suspicion that Master François was a great sceptic, who believed in nothing in the world save our pitiful human lot, which is helped by compassion and softened by irony. To doubt the stories of Herodotus in 1540! Why, our excellent Rollin still believed them under Louis XIV!

After this last stop at the Island of Lies, Pantagruel and his companions finally reached the end of their journey. He came to Lantern Land, the description of which is taken from the True History, so abundantly exploited in the Fourth Book. That is a good sign. In these imitations of Lucian we seem to recognise our Rabelais and we are less doubtful of having the key of the temple and hearing the words of the Oracle. Lantern Land is inhabited by living lanterns. The Queen is a lantern dressed in rock crystal, wrought damask-wise and beset with large diamonds. The lanterns of the royal blood are clad in gypseous alabaster, the rest in horn, paper and oil-cloth. One of them is earthen and shaped like a pot. It is the lantern of Epictetus which, according to Lucian, was sold to a collector for three thousand drachmas.

The Pantagruelists dine with the Queen, and it would seem as if it were a philosophical banquet, that these lanterns and torches represent wisdom and virtue. When the banquet was finished, the Queen gave each guest his choice of a lantern to light his way home. Here it is Rabelais who speaks, and who but Rabelais could have said what follows ?

“ We selected and chose the friend of the great Messer Pierre Lamy, whom I had formerly known. Unmistakably she also recognised me, and she appeared to us more divine, more sprightly, more learned, more wise, more eloquent, more kindly, more gracious, and more suited to conduct us than any other that was in the company. Very humbly thanking the Royal Lady, we were accompanied as far as our ship by seven young jiggling torches, the clear Diana shining brightly ”

Who but Rabelais could have written these exquisite lines ? Who could have recalled in this learned allegory the forty-year-old memory of the young monk who shared at the Abbey of Fontenay the studies and perils of Friar François, and who consulted the Virgilian lotteries in order to find out whether he should fear the hobgoblins ? Who but Rabelais could thus have paid the tribute of memory to the friend of his young years ?

Now we have come to the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, which is on an island quite close to Lantern Land, where Pantagruel and his companions are conducted by a wise lantern. First they pass through a large vineyard filled with all sorts of vines, bearing leaves, flowers and fruits all the year round. The learned lantern orders each of them to eat three grapes, to put vine leaves in his shoes, and to take a green branch in his left hand. At the end of the vineyard stood an ancient arch, ornamented with the trophies of the drinker, which led to an arbour consisting of vine branches loaded with grapes, under which the travellers went.

“There was a mystical reason,” answered the most perspicacious lantern, “for had she gone under it, the wine, or the grapes of which ’tis made, had been over her head, and then she would have seem’d overtopped and master’d by wine. Which implies that priests, and all persons who devote themselves to the contemplation of divine things, ought to keep their minds sedate and calm, and avoid whatever might disturb and discompose their tranquillity; which nothing is more apt to do than drunkenness. You also could not come into the Holy Bottle’s presence, after you have gone through the arch, did not the noble priestess, Bacbuc, first see your shoes full of vine-leaves, which action is diametrically opposite to the other, and signifies that you despise wine and tread it under foot.”

They went underground through a vault on which was painted a dance of women and satyrs, like the painted cellar at Chinon, the foremost city in the world—which sounds like authentic Rabelais. At the foot of the stairway they came to a portal of jasper of Doric order, on which was written in letters of gold : ἐν οἴνῳ ἀλήθεια (In vino veritas) The massive gates were of bronze, with carved reliefs, in which we may see an allusion to the gates of the baptistry of the beautiful San Giovanni in Florence, which Michaelangelo declared worthy to be placed at the entrance to Paradise, and which Rabelais admired while Friar Bernard Lardon of Amiens was looking for a cook-shop.

The gates opened. The visitors beheld two tablets of Indian bronze, of a bluish colour, bearing these two inscriptions ·

Ducunt volentem fata, nolentem trahunt, which the author translates : “ Fate leads the willing and the unwilling draws,” And this sentence from the Greek “ All things tend to their end ”

The temple which they entered was paved in mosaics, representing vine-leaves, lizards and snails, which the author describes as one who has seen Roman mosaics · on the roof and walls they saw, also in mosaic, the victories of Bacchus in India, and old Silenus accompanied by rustic youths, horned like kids, cruel as lions, perpetually dancing the Cordax The description of these pictures betrays an admirer of the works of antiquity, and especially a reader of Philostratus and Lucian The number of figures, which is both exact and enormous, sixty-nine thousand, two hundred and twenty-seven, in one case, and eighty-five thousand, one hundred and thirty-three, in the other, is quite in accordance with the statistical procedure of Master François The lamp, which illuminated the temple as the sun would have done, had a body ornamented with a frieze representing a children’s battle The oil and wick burned perpetually, without ever being renewed

While the travellers were admiring these wonders, Bacbuc, the priestess of the Holy Bottle, and her attendants, came towards them, her face joyful and smiling, led them to a fountain surrounded by columns and topped by a dome which rose in the middle of the temple, and, handing them cups and goblets, graciously invited them to drink. Each drinker found that the water of this fountain tasted like whatever wine he fancied, Beaune, Grave, gracious and sparkling, wine of Mireveaux, colder than ice ; as their fancies changed the water changed its taste.

Then the priestess clothed Panurge in the habit of the neophytes admitted to the mysteries and, after he had sung some verses by way of incantation, she threw a powder into the fountain which caused it to boil and hum like a beehive. Then this word was heard :

TRINC

Bacbus took Panurge gently by the arm, saying : " Friend, offer your thanks to indulgent heaven, as reason requires ; you have soon had the word of the Goddess Bottle, and the kindest, most favourable and certain word of an answer that I ever yet heard her give, since I officiate here at her most sacred oracle."

Having spoken thus, the priestess took a huge book covered in silver, plunged it into the fountain and said :

" The philosophers, preachers and doctors of your world feed you up with fine words and cant at the ears : now, here we really incorporate our precepts at the mouth. Therefore, I'll not say to you, read this chapter, see this gloss ; no, I say to you, taste me this fine chapter, swallow me this rare gloss. Formerly an ancient prophet of the Jewish nation eat a book, and became a clerk even to the very teeth ; now will I have you to drink one, that you may be a clerk to your very liver. Here, open your mandibles."

"Panurge gaping as wide as his jaws could stretch, Bacbuc took the silver book, at least we took it for a real book, for it look'd just for the world like a breviary," but it was a venerated, true and natural bottle, filled with Falernian wine of which she made Panurge swallow every drop.

"This," quoth Panurge, "was a notable chapter, a most authentic gloss ! Is this all that the Trismegistian Bottle's word means ?"

"Nothing more," returned Bacbuc, "for trinc is a panophean word, that is, a word understood, us'd and celebrated by all nations, and signifies Drink.

"Here we hold not that laughing but drinking is the distinguishing character of man. I don't say drinking, taking the word singly and absolutely in the strictest sense ; no, beasts then might put in for a share ; I mean drinking cool, delicious wine. For you must know, my beloved, that by wine we become divine ; neither can there be a surer argument, or a less deceitful divination ; wine, δυναμις in Greek, means strength, power, for 'tis in its power to fill the soul with all truth, learning and philosophy. If you observe what is written in Ionian letters on the temple-gate, you may have understood that truth is in wine. The Goddess Bottle therefore directs you to that divine liquor, be your self the expounder of your undertaking."

Thus spake Bacbuc.

"'Tis impossible," said Pantragrue, "to speak more to the purpose than does this true priest, Wine, then."

"Let us trinc," said Panurge.

What is this wine drawn from the holy fountain, which gives strength and power to the mind ? The author does not say, but he allows us to guess It is not the juice of the grape, in the strict and literal sense , it is knowledge which, in an upright soul, teaches real duties and gives happiness, at least so far as the latter is attainable in this world There is no longer any question of Panurge's getting married, and whether his wife will deceive him The good Pantagruel and his learned company did not take so long a journey in order to find the answer to a riddle which, after all, concerned only Panurge himself It was about the whole of humanity that the Pantagruelists went to consult the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, and the Oracle replied trinc, drink your fill at the fountains of knowledge To know, in order to love, is the secret of life. Avoid the hypocrites, the ignorant, the cruel free yourselves from vain terrors, study man and the universe, learn to know the laws of the physical and moral world, so that you may obey them and them alone ; drink, drink knowledge , drink truth , drink love

CHAPTER X

CONCLUSION

MADAME ROLAND, when condemned by a bloody tribunal, appealed on the scaffold to impartial posterity—the happy illusion of an innocent victim. Posterity consists of human beings, and is never impartial, basing its unanimous consent upon ignorance and indifference. Sometimes posterity has an epic and legendary sense which magnifies and simplifies. It never has any historic sense nor any perception of the truth.

Tradition effects strange metamorphoses, causing the heroes whom it sweeps along to lead a posthumous existence very different from the life they lived in flesh and blood. Rabelais is a case in point. He was popular because of his undeserved reputation as an intrepid drinker, and tradition composed a biography of him wholly dissimilar from that of which I have tried to present the solid elements. It may not be without interest, after we have seen the real Rabelais, to indicate some of the traits of the legendary Rabelais. Therefore, selecting two or three wretched fables, which are to be found in all the old biographies of the author, I shall relate them as briefly as possible, beginning with one of the most fabulous, which is concerned with the last stay of Master François in Montpellier.

While Rabelais was professing medicine, according to the legend, Chancellor du Prat rendered a decree abolishing the privileges of the Faculty at Montpellier. The masters had recourse to this colleague whose mind they esteemed. They deputed him to go to court and have the decree revoked which affected them. On his arrival in Paris Rabelais presented himself at the Chancellor's house and, not having been received, he marched up and down in front of the door in a green robe and wearing a long, grey beard. Everybody stopped to look at him. To those who questioned him he replied that he was a flayer of calves and that those who wished to be the first to be flayed must hurry. The Chancellor was at table when they reported to him the remarks of this eccentric person. He ordered him to be brought in, and Rabelais harangued him with such learning and eloquence that the Chancellor promised to re-establish and confirm the privileges of the University of Montpellier.

It is hardly necessary to insist upon the improbability of such a story.

In the old lives of the author there is also an incident which recalls the episode of Sancho Panza's doctor on the Island of Barataria.

Rabelais, Guillaume du Bellay's physician, being present at one of that gentleman's dinners, struck with his rod a dish containing a fine fish, and declared that it was indigestible. Whereupon the servants carried away the fish intact to the kitchen, where Master François hastened to devour it. When Seigneur Guillaume, discovering his doctor at table, asked him why he was eating a dish which he had declared to be bad for the stomach,

Rabelais replied : “ I did not mean that the fish was indigestible but merely the dish which contained it ”

Thus our forebears tried to render the life of Rabelais Rabelaisian

Although it is insignificant and incongruous, the famous little story must be told which has given rise to the phrase : “ Rabelais’ quarter of an hour,” since the phrase has passed into the language It is as follows .

On his return from Rome our author happened to be in hostelry at Lyons, badly dressed, and without money to pay for his lodging and his journey to Paris, where business awaited him In these circumstances he took some ashes from the fireplace and put them in little bags, on which he wrote : “ Poison to kill the King ” ; “ Poison to kill the Duc d’Orléans ” Then he left them very conspicuously about his room The landlady found them there and, greatly terrified, went to the King’s lieutenant who promptly sent the man with the bags to Paris. When he was brought before the King he greatly amused the latter by telling him the story of his expedient

It is strange that such a story could have seemed credible

Once upon a time it was held that the statement was authentic which Rabelais made, when dying, to the page sent by Cardinal du Bellay to inquire about the patient’s health “ Tell Monsignor the state in which you see me. I am going away in search of a great perhaps He is in the magpie’s nest Tell him not to leave it Drop the curtain, the farce is over.” This is much more literary than the rest and is partly imitated from Suetonius. But it is equally untrue.

Rabelais became popular only through the three or four anecdotes which I have quoted. His writings never reached the ignorant masses, and it is an actual fact, although scarcely credible, that the broadsides and the volumes in the Bibliothèque Bleue, which spread the portrait and life of Gargantua throughout the French countryside, show none of his traits as described by Rabelais. They are derived from popular stories earlier than his Panurge and Friar John are unknown to them. Despite what has been said of it, Pantagruel is a work written solely for the lettered, Pantagruelism is a philosophy accessible only to the élite of rare minds, it is almost an esoteric doctrine, hidden and secret. Prominent amongst these rare minds in the sixteenth century, is Cardinal du Perron, who described Pantagruel as the book par excellence, the true Bible, and consigned to the servants' pantry those of his guests who confessed to not having read it.

Montaigne mentions Rabelais once in his Essays. I shall quote the passage, although it has little intrinsic value, because everything in Montaigne is of interest :

“ An over obstinate continuation and plodding contention doth dazle, dul, and weary the same. My sight is thereby confounded and diminished—— If one booke seeme tedious unto me, I take another, which I follow not with any earnestness, except it be at such houres as I am idle, or that I am weary with doing nothing. I am not greatly affected to new bookes, because ancient authors are in my judgement more full and pithy, nor am I much addicted to Greeke bookes, forasmuch as my understanding can not well rid his worke with a chuldish and apprentice intelligence. Amongst moderne bookes meerly pleasant, I esteeme Bocace, his Decameron, Rabelais, and the kisses of John the second (if they may be placed under this title) worth the paines-taking to reade them. As for Amadis and such like trash of writings, they had never the credit so much as to allure my youth to delight in them ”

Thus Montaigne ranks Pantagruel amongst the works of mere entertainment which amuse him. This opinion, it seems to me, is irresponsible and frivolous, to say the least, a lapse on the part of the genius who must be placed with Rabelais in the first rank of sixteenth century writers. What a contrast between the son of Touraine, solid, massive, compact, four square, rough, colourful, and the supple Gascon, drifting, and variable ! Montaigne is assuredly an agreeable and profitable companion, but he is difficult to grasp ; he slips away, he escapes. Only the professors are certain that they understand him, because it is their profession to understand everything. I read him constantly, I like him, I admire him, but I am not sure that I know him well. His mind changes from one phrase to another, sometimes in the middle of a phrase, and it need not be a very long one either. If it is true that he has portrayed himself in his Essays, he has given an image of himself more broken than the reflection of the moon upon the sea. I have departed a little from my subject, but I could not pass over the great name of Montaigne in silence.

This Rabelais, whom Montaigne pronounced frivolous, was esteemed for his judgment and teaching above all the writers of his time by Estienne Pasquier, a grave jurist, a profound historian, and a wise philosopher.

In his Recherches he says : “ By reason of the humour which he brought to light, jesting at everything, he made himself without an equal. For my own part, I will frankly confess that I have so playful a mind as never to be tired of reading him, nor did I ever read him without finding food for laughter and my own profit as well.”

Estienne Pasquier is not the only grave magistrate of his time who was pleased and edified by Rabelais. President de Thou, the great historian, praises Rabelais for having written with the freedom of Democritus and with joyful buffoonery a most ingenious work in which, under fictitious names, he introduces every order of the State and society

Jacques de Thou did not, any more than Estienne Pasquier, fall into the error of Montaigne who saw in Rabelais only a buffoon Nevertheless, when he wrote some Latin verses about the incomparable author, conforming to popular tradition, he made of him a merry toper. The drunkenness of this Silenus of Chinon was material for classic verse. It was in 1598 that Jacques de Thou composed the verses to which I refer, in the following circumstances Having gone that year to Chinon, he stopped at the house of Rabelais' father, which had become a hostelry. At the request of one of his travelling companions, he wrote some verses on this subject, making the shade of Rabelais speak of his satisfaction at the change. It is a pleasant little poem, of which I shall quote a French translation, made at the beginning of the eighteenth century :

RABELAIS

RABELAIS

J'ai passé tout mon temps à rire
Mes écrits libres en font foi
Ils sont si plaisants qu'a les lire,
On rira même malgré soi

La raison sérieuse ennuie
Et rend amers nos plus beaux jours
Que peut-on faire de la vie,
Sans rire et plaisanter toujours ?

Aussi Bacchus, Dieu de la Joie,
Qui régla toujours mon destin,
Jusqu'en l'autre monde m'envoie,
De quoi dissiper mon chagrin

Car de ma maison paternelle
Il vient de faire un cabaret
Où le plaisir se renouvelle
Entre le blanc et le claret

Les jours de fête on s'y régale,
On y rit du soir au matin
Dans le salon et dans la salle,
Tout Chinon se trouve en festin.

Là, chacun dit sa chasonette ,
Là, le plus sage est le plus fou,
Et danse au son de la musette
Les plus gais branles du Poitou

RABELAIS

La cave s'y trouve placée
Où fut jadis mon cabinet.
On m'y porte plus sa pensée
Qu'aux douceurs d'un vin frais et net.

Que si Pluton, que rien ne tente,
Voulait se payer de raison
Et permettre à mon ombre errante
De faire un tour à ma maison,

Quelque prix que j'en puisse attendre,
Ce serait mon premier souhait,
De la louer ou de la vendre
Pour l'usage que l'on en fait

Thus, for the Muses, for the Latin Muse of de Thou, as for the French Muse of Ronsard, Rabelais is a drunkard. The Muses are liars ; but they know how to win credit and to have their fables believed

Amongst the Pantagruelists of the seventeenth century may be mentioned Bernier, the Gassendist philosopher, the friend of Ninon de Lenclos and Madame de la Sablière , the scholar Huet, Bishop of Avranches ; Ménage ; Madame de Sévigné ; La Fontaine , Racine , Molière ; Fontenelle—a rather fine list, it must be admitted. As for La Bruyère, his opinion of our author is well known . “ Where he is bad, he far exceeds the worst, that is what charms the vulgar ; where he is good, he achieves the exquisite and the excellent ; he is fit for the consumption of the most delicate " Of course, Pantagruel was a dish for the most delicate, for La Fontaine, Molière, for La Bruyère himself So far as charming the vulgar is concerned, if by the vulgar he means people who have neither intelligence nor education nor refined knowledge, how could Rabelais have done it at the time when La Bruyère was writing, about 1688, since his language by that time was comprehensible only to the lettered ? To the peasant, the porter, the shop assistant, the tradesman, it was Greek.

Voltaire came late to Rabelais, but when he began to like him, he became madly enthusiastic and learned him by heart. The eighteenth century might be offended in its delicacy at times by Rabelais, but it could not but enjoy the philosophy of the Curé of Meudon, who then had rather successful imitators, like the Abbé Dulaurens

In 1791 Ginguené, poet and publicist, published a book entitled, On the Authority of Rabelais in the Present Revolution and in the Civil Constitution of the Clergy,<sup>1</sup> in which our author is considered as a philosopher, as a politician, and rather dragged by force into modern ideas Rabelais, who mocked prophets and soothsayers, must have laughed in the Elysian Fields at the commentators who made him predict the French Revolution However, it is only fair to say that great thinkers see far ahead, prepare the future and set the task for the statesmen who accomplish it, while wearing blinkers, or sometimes blindfolded, like horses in a riding school Of course, I do not refer to any existing European statesmen

In the nineteenth century, criticism was well informed, very alert and, on the whole, very supple, skilful in understanding the feelings, manners, characters and language of the past, and it was very favourable to Rabelais, recognised his genius, consecrated his glory. But, as it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to get away from one's own period, even at a time of evocation, restitutions, reconstructions, at a time when Michelet had made history a resurrection ; as all of us seek and see only ourselves in others, as we cannot help attributing our feelings to the people of former times, the general tendency of the critics, great and small, of 1830 and 1850 was to romanticise the author of Pantagruel, and to incline him, if not to melancholy—that was too obviously impossible—at least to gravity, to meditative profundity, and if one were in the least tinged with liberalism and free thought, to identify him with an independent philosophy which was not of his time nor in his character. This is noticeable in Michelet, in Henri Martin, in Eugène Noel Sainte-Beuve, with his customary subtlety, corrected this error and restored his independence and his free humour to the giant of the sixteenth century

Lamartine has said many harsh things about Rabelais. Victor Hugo speaks very well of him Neither of them had read him, but each of them had a species of intuition Lamartine divined in him a man quite different from himself, a genius quite opposed to his own. On the contrary, Victor Hugo imagined that there was some relationship, some resemblance between the creator of Gargantua and the creator of Quasimodo Hence the judgments which they pronounced. Each of them, while talking of Rabelais, was thinking of himself Guizot, as we have seen, devoted a lengthy and substantial study to the pedagogy of Rabelais There is no aspect from which our author was not considered during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. We have had excellent works upon Rabelais the doctor, Rabelais the botanist, Rabelais the humanist, Rabelais the jurist, Rabelais the architect. Amongst the most modern works on this great man I shall mention the interesting analyses of Jean Fleury, and Paul Stapfer's excellent literary study, the notes of Rathery, of Moland, the work of Marty-Lavaux, and the invaluable articles in the Revue des Etudes Rabelaisiennes, edited with such zeal and knowledge by M. Lefranc of the Collège de France.

Now we have reached the end of our task, which your kind forbearance has rendered easy and pleasant. We have made a tour around the giant, and, like the pilgrims in the tale, approached them without fear. Happy am I if I have been able to commend him to you as being as good and lovable as he is great and imposing. It will be an honour to me to have celebrated the French genius before Latins called, in the New World, to a most magnificent destiny. And I take my leave happy and proud of my task if I have been able to contribute, even with so trivial an offering, towards the tightening of the bonds of sympathy which link the spirit of the Argentine to the spirit of France.
